The Kehillah of Nikolsburg, as I said before, was probably founded about 1420 when the Jews were expelled from the neighboring province of Lower Austria. The oldest rabbi that we have any knowledge of is Judah Loewe Ben Bezalel, known usually under the name of "Der Hoiche Reb Loeb." To some people it may be news that the names of the sons of Jacob are often connected with the names of animals to whom Jacob in his dying blessing (Genesis, 49) compares them. So we have Judah, who is compared to a lion, surnamed "Loewe," colloquially called "Loeb." Similarly amongst the Italians the surname is Leone. The Orientals do not seem to have adopted this practice, in all likelihood borrowed from the Germans. For the same reason Benjamin is surnamed "Wolf" and Naphtali "Hirsch," also spelled "Hirz" and mispronounced "Herz," whence our frequent family names Herz and Herzel derive their origin. I may say here that Graetz' transliteration "Liwa" is pedantic and not correct. Writing the German in Hebrew characters, the "Yod" stands for both the German "i" and "e." A descendant of Rabbi Loeb, Rabbi Jair Hayim Bacharach of Worms, born 1634, reports that his great-grandfather, the son-in-law of the rabbi, was called in the ghetto of Prague "Yizchak Reb Loeb'ns."

Rabbi Loeb was, according to the testimony of his contemporaries, the historian David Gans, rabbi of Nikolsburg from 1553 to 1573. About his biography we know very little. It is a peculiarity of our rabbinical sources, back to the time of the Talmud, that they give us no biographic information. The man's life was the book that he wrote. Rabbi Loeb may have been a native of Worms, or of Posen. The Talmud students led a migratory life. As early as the twelfth century, we read in the report of one of the usual blood accusations, that a Jew who was accused of having killed his own son, whose body was fished out of the Rhine, testified that the body was not that of his own son, and that the latter was attending school in Spain. In the fifteenth century we read of one, Joseph Ben Moses from some place near the Rhine, who was sent to the school of the famous Rabbi Isserlein of Marburg, in the Austrian province of Styria, to observe the life of this famous teacher, and make careful notes of all his practices. So the students moved to and fro from Germany to Poland. Unfortunately they did not take the trouble to report to us the certainly very interesting experiences they must have had in those days of slow traffic on their journeys to distant lands. It seems rather probable that Rabbi Loeb was from Worms, and was sent in his early years to Poland to study. As he was rabbi as early as 1553, and died in 1609, he must have reached a high old age.

Of his activity in Nikolsburg nothing is known. Even of the rabbis of the eighteenth century there was hardly any tradition left when I arrived there in 1868. The ghetto lived according to the Talmudic statement, "New troubles make us forget the old ones," and therefore took no interest in history. The prominence of Rabbi Loeb began when he was rabbi in Prague, which he left twice to accept the rabbinical position of Posen, returning towards the end of his life, about 1598. His numerous books were all published in Prague, but they contain, as far as is known, no reference to his personal life.

The most important story connected with the "tall Rabbi Loeb" is the report of his miraculous creation of a dummy, that could be put to life and put to death at will. The belief in the possibility of creating such a Homunculus—or Koppelmann Lieben, the first editor of the historic tombstone inscriptions of Prague, writes, "Homunculum"—in Hebrew called "Golem," is common among many nations. Goethe used it twice in brilliant poetic presentations, in his ballad, "Der Zauberlehrling," and in the second part of his "Faust," where he is the forerunner of Ibsen and Hauptmann and the other authors of the modern allegorical drama, uses this story as an allegory of the new humanity, which is to be a combination of beauty and wisdom. The story goes that Rabbi Loeb created such a "Golem" molding a figure of clay, and placing an amulet containing a magic formula into its mouth, which gave to the clay figure life, and enabled it to act like a rational being, while it became dead clay as soon as the amulet was taken from it. On Sabbath even the great Cabbalists have no power over demons, and therefore the rabbi had to remove the amulet every Friday. On one such day, being very busy, the rabbi rushed to the synagogue and forgot all about the demon which he had created. The latter, like Goethe's "Zauberlehrling," began to have a very good time in the ghetto, when frightened people rushed to the "Altneuschul," the cathedral synagogue of the ghetto, and informed the rabbi of what had happened. The Hazan had just begun to sing Psalm 92, the Sabbath song, when the rabbi interrupted him, and told him to wait. He left the synagogue, grabbed the "Golem," and taking the amulet out of its mouth returned to the synagogue, where the services were resumed. Fearing the consequences he never revived the Golem again. It was taken to the attic of the "Altneuschul," where it is still found today.

Nobody needs to waste any time in proving that the report is not historical, but it is worth while stating that in all likelihood it originated as late as the nineteenth century. The story of such animated automatons is, as I said before, quite general. It is found in the Talmud as in other old literatures. The Talmud tells it in the following form. Rabba created a human being, and sent it to Rabbi Zera. The latter said: "Thou work of sorcery return to thy dust." Two hundred years ago, or even less, such legends were taken seriously. Zebi Ashkenazi (1658-1718), who was successively rabbi of Sarajewo, Altona, Amsterdam, and Lemberg, discusses the question whether such an automaton might be counted as one of a Minyan. He answers in the negative, because if such was the case, Rabbi Zera would have been guilty of murder. In connection with this decision the rabbi reports that his own grandfather or great-grandfather, Rabbi Elijah of Chelm, had performed such a miracle. Perhaps this is the reason that amongst Polish Jews, to be from Chelm means to be an idiot, because "Golem" is used in Yiddish for idiot. Rabbi Zebi Ashkenazi was the great-grandfather of chief rabbi, Solomon Herschell of London, who died in 1842. His son, Jacob Emden, officially called Jacob Herschell (1696-1776), discusses the same question. As legends usually grow more distinct, the older they grow, Jacob heard of this famous ancestor, Elijah, that he had a fight with the "Golem" that he had created. The investigation which Zebi Ashkenazi discussed merely from a theoretical point of view, seemed important enough for some of the glossarists of the Schulchan Aruk to be mentioned, and the great Palestinian scholar, Hayim Joseph David Azulai (1723-1806), discusses the same question in his notes to the Schulchan Aruk. The important point is that neither of these men shows any knowledge of the legend that connects the "tall Rabbi Loeb" with this miraculous creature. Yet it is unlikely that Zebi Aschkenazi and his son Jacob Emden should have been ignorant of the story, had it been known in their days, for both of them lived for some time in Prague. Azulai, who traveled considerably in Europe as solicitor of alms for Palestine, does not seem to have ever visited Prague, but he was so well read in rabbinical literature, that one feels almost certain that the story of Rabbi Loeb and his automaton would have been known to him, had it been found in any work published up to the end of the eighteenth century. The same may be said of Rabbi Jair Hayim Bacharach, whose grandmother, Eva, to whom he dedicated his book, was the granddaughter of the great rabbi. This granddaughter was already married, when Rabbi Loeb died, and she would have surely told her grandson this story amongst others relating to her revered grandfather. There is another branch of the family descended in the male line from Eva's father, Isaac Ben Samson Cohen, the son-in-law of Rabbi Loeb. His great-grandson, Naphthali Cohen, was rabbi in Frankfurt-on-the-Main, at the time of the great fire in 1712, which destroyed almost the entire ghetto. The fire broke out in the house of the rabbi, and he was arrested under the charge of arson. He was subsequently discharged, but conditions had become so unpleasant that he left Frankfurt, wandering over Europe until in 1719 he decided to emigrate to Palestine. He died, however, in Constantinople before he reached his destination. Rabbi Naphthali, who was also the author of rabbinical works, speaks repeatedly of his family, but never mentions the story of which he as a Cabbalist surely would have been proud. Some fifty years ago the Prague publisher, Wolf Pascheles, published a collection of Jewish stories, called "Sippurim," in which the story of Rabbi Loeb's "Golem" is also found. It is significant that the first edition of the "Sippurim" was published in Hebrew characters, while the second was already printed in German characters. This collection, which became very popular, seems to have been the source from which the story of Rabbi Loeb's miracle became current.

This short period sufficed to make the belief general. About 1880 the venerable building of the "Altneuschul" required a thorough repair. It might be interesting in this connection to report the fact that Rabbi Samuel Freund (1794-1881) the last remnant of Prague's glorious tradition, objected to it. He declared that it was a tradition that the old synagogue must never be whitewashed. Rabbi Samuel, who from 1867 occupied the position of acting chief rabbi, until the election of Marcus Hirsch, in 1880, was filled with the enthusiasm for Prague's antiquities, and of rather caustic nature, so that people feared him. Chief Rabbi Hirsch, a man of mild conciliatory character, not wishing to contradict the old man, proved from rabbinical literature, that such a tradition was not binding, unless it could be produced in written or printed records. This Rabbi Samuel could not do. He, therefore, declared that, since during the massacre of 1389 many Jews were killed in the synagogue where they sought refuge, the blood, which was splashed on the walls must not be covered. This indeed is a rabbinical law. Rabbi Hirsch then declared that the thing to do was to allow a scaffolding to be erected, and to make an investigation. This investigation proved the existence of inscriptions dating from the sixteenth century, and so the last argument against a renovation was refuted. While this work was going on, the attic was for the first time in many years entered. For the explanation of this fact, it must be stated that no stairs lead to the attic, which is accessible through a trap door, that could only be reached from the scaffolding. Everybody was anxious to learn whether the "Golem" would be found in this mysterious place. Surely only a few were disappointed when the news came, that the attic contained exactly the same things that are found in the attic of every old synagogue, decayed prayer-books, and old manuscripts. The event was discussed in the house of the rabbi, when the sexton called for the rabbi to bring him to the synagogue, as was a custom prevalent both in Prague and in Nikolsburg. The idea underlying this custom evidently is to give the rabbi a guard of honor. Usually at that time some visitors were assembled in the rabbi's study. They spoke jestingly of their disappointment. The sexton, whom I merely remember as Reb Wolf, was the type of the old citizen of the Prague ghetto, proud of his native city, and in as much as he acted as guide for the tourists, none of whom failed to visit the old synagogue and the cemetery, full of legends. When the company left he said: "Rabbi, I knew they wouldn't find him." Rabbi Hirsch replied with a smile, "So did I." "No," said Reb Wolf, "I am not jesting, I know what has become of him." Rabbi Hirsch looked at him rather curiously, and Reb Wolf continued, "When I was a young man and entered my position as assistant to the former "Shammes," the then "Gabbe" (president of the synagogue), told both of us to take a ladder, go into the attic, and bring that "Golem" down. I feared from the start that there would be trouble, and I kept in the background, while my senior colleague, boldly approached the "Golem" whom I could see in the dim light of the attic, lying in the corner. Just as the man tried to grab the "Golem," the latter sat up and gave him a "Patch," that if I had not caught him in my arms, he would have fallen through the open trap door. I noticed also that the "Golem" had his mouth open, and I could see on his protruding tongue the letter "Shin," the first letter of "Shadday." We were now more careful, and as my colleague threw his hands around the figure of the "Golem," I quickly scraped that remnant of the charm off his tongue, and the fellow never offered any resistance. We carried him down the ladder, took him to the cemetery and buried him there." Rabbi Hirsch was amazed beyond description. "Reb Wolf," said he, "are you joking, are you drunk or delirious? What is the matter with you?" Reb Wolf protested solemnly, "Rabbi," said he, "do you think that I would dare to belie you? Let these hands," he said, raising his arms, "rot away from my body, if they did not bury the 'Golem' in the old cemetery."

When Rabbi Hirsch discussed the story with me afterwards, he said, "The man is not such a rigorous orthodox. He takes the tourists to the synagogue on Sabbath, and willingly accepts their money, but evidently we have here a case of auto-suggestion. The man had to answer the question about the "Golem" so often, and told the story that this relic was hidden away in the old garret so often that he finally came to believe it." The sexton in such an old synagogue is always a type of conservatism, and it seems also that the office tends to longevity. In my own native town we had such a "shammes" called "Mordche," whose name I borrowed in my novel "Andere Zeiten," who lived to be ninety-eight years old. He also was a guardian of the most ancient traditions and nobody knew which curtain and which Sefer Torah was to be used on certain Sabbaths as Mordche did. . . . In Constantinople, I visited the synagogue of the Karaites, and also found a sexton, who was said to be over a hundred years old. He showed his respect for ancient traditions by kneeling on the floor before reciting the blessing for the Torah. The destruction of the old Ghetto of Prague probably has removed these practices. It is hardly probable that the present chief rabbi is called for every morning and evening to be conducted to the synagogue. The congregation of Prague has grown to more than twice its number, but it has lost in intensity of religious life. Poor Nikolsburg has lost both in quantity and quality.

UNITED SYNAGOGUE OF AMERICA.

The Executive Council of the United Synagogue of America held its last meeting at Dropsie College in Philadelphia on the 3d inst., Dr. Cyrus Adler presided.

Communications from various quarters concerning affiliation were received, and the following congregations admitted to membership, viz.: Congregation Beth El, Springfield, Mass. Congregation B'nai Jeshurun, Cleveland, Ohio. Congregation Tifereth Israel, Des Moines, Iowa.

A Central Administration Office and Synagogue Bureau has been established at the Jewish Theological Seminary building in New York under the Joint Auspices of the United Synagogue, the Jewish Theological Seminary and the Alumni Association of the Seminary. Its purpose is to afford a means of intercommunication between congregations and rabbis and generally to further the interests of both.

The United Synagogue is making arrangements for its incorporation.

Rabbi Samuel Cohen of Kansas City, Mo., has established in his city a Jewish School under the auspices of the United Synagogue.

The United Synagogue has further directed its activity towards promoting Jewish life and observance among the students at universities throughout the country.

JEWS CANNOT BE ARMY OFFICERS.

As a result of the anti-Semitic agitation carried on by the Russian and Polish press, an order was received by the Russian military governor of Galicia that henceforth no Jew shall be allowed to rise from the ranks to any office in the army. The governor expressed his great regret that he will not be able to reward the extraordinary loyalty and bravery of his Jewish soldiers. At the beginning of the war, there was a report that Russia will allow Jews to become officers and several Jews were actually raised to higher ranks in the army. This will now be impossible, thanks to the bitter agitation carried on by the anti-Semitic papers.

Jews and Christian Science

How Christian Science Differs from Rational Religion.

It is useless to quote further and to analyze other passages from the Christian Science text-book, passages of the same or similar import. The whole system with all its propositions is derived from the following premises: "God is good, and God is All-in-All."

"God is good, God is Spirit, etc." On that all religions agree. But, as to "God is All-in-All," rational religion and common sense philosophy demur. The world as we know it, the world around us, is surely not God. God may be above the world, in the world, permeating and surrounding the world, but we can not say that the world as we know it is God. It is simply playing fast and loose with words to do so.

It is easy enough to pile up such propositions as these: "God is All-in-All; God is Spirit; All is Spirit; there is no matter." But where is the sense in it all? Tell us first what you mean by matter, and what you mean by spirit, and then see if you can make anything out of those preposterous statements.

"God is good, God is spirit, love, etc." Granted. That is what our religion teaches, what orthodox Christianity and liberal Christianity, and other faiths teach. Now, what follows? According to Christian Science, "If God is All-in-All, Mind, Spirit, therefore, all is mind, matter is unreal, and sin and disease are unreal, etc." "Not at all," says rational religion. Assuming that God is all that we claim He is; still, He has created the material world just as it is, with its good and its evil, just as we actually experience it. Why? Many answers may be given to that question, and are given by theologians and philosophers. We are in this world on probation. We are to fight evil and to overcome it. We are to co-operate with God in improving and perfecting His world. We are to learn to be patient and good, and to be reconciled to Him even in the midst of trials. And, finally, we must confess that there is a great deal of mystery in the divine rule of the world which we can not fathom.

That is probably the best answer of all. We do not understand God's plan. We do not know why He has created death-dealing poisons, destructive reptiles and animals, and raging elements that cause ruin and death. We do not know why He has so ordered His world, that life, to sustain itself, must feed on life, so that some animal must be destroyed in order that another animal may live. The lamb is destroyed by the wolf, and the wolf by man; and so throughout all creation. What is God's purpose in doing or allowing it all? We do not know.

Long, long ago a Hebrew sage exclaimed: "Canst thou by searching find out God? Canst thou find out the Almighty unto perfection? . . . If he cut off, and shut up, or gather together, then who can hinder him?" We may with the poet reassure ourselves that "somehow good will result from ill."

Such are religion's answers. At any rate, to satisfy our definition of God, we do not try to deny or ignore our actual experiences, the real facts of life and the world. We try to explain them, and to reconcile them with our theology, as best we can.

Christian Science, to be consistent, should argue in this manner: "God is good. . . . evil is not real. Titanic and Volturno disasters, that in a brief moment destroy hundreds of human lives, rob women of their husbands, or children of their mothers, break so many hearts, and plunge a nation in grief, are not real, for there is no evil. Droughts and failure of crops in India or China, where millions must starve and die of famine, are not real. Floods, earthquakes, volcanic eruptions with resultant death and devastation are not real." Nothing is real but Mrs. Eddy, her text-book, and the healers. But how do we know that they are real?

"God is good, all is mind, all is good." But Christian Science also admits that it is mortal mind that causes evil, disease, sin, etc., and these, while they last, are very unpleasant. Otherwise there would be no sense in going to a healer at all. But since God is all-good, and the universe all mind, all good, why should there be any mortal mind to give [illegible] to even temporary or fictitious un-[illegible]? Why did not the good God [illegible] man without any possibility of his mind ever becoming mortal to mislead him into temporary error, sin, and disease?

You see, no matter in which direction we try to follow up the Christian Science argument, we get nowhere. And all that because Christian Science first makes certain definitions of God, and then, ignoring all facts, tries to make everything fit the definitions, and even then does not succeed in doing it.

Suppose we follow the example, and argue in the same manner about another subject: Man's mind is akin to the divine mind of the universe. Since God is omniscient, and never forgets anything, man's mind, too, is omniscient, knows all, the past and the future, and never forgets anything. Well, what is wrong with this argument? Simply this, that it dos not correspond to facts. Man's mind may be akin to the divine mind. Still man does not know everything, is very forgetful, knows little of the past, nothing of the future.

But let us carry on the Christian Science process of reasoning still further. It says: There is no pain. Well, let the Christian Scientist put his hand in a flame, or sit on a pin, or the point of a tack. Or let him follow the teaching of the Gospel: "If thy right eye offend thee, pluck it out, and cast it from thee; . . . and if thy right hand offend thee, cut it off and cast it from thee." Why not? Hunger and thirst are painful. But there is no pain. Therefore abstain from food and drink. Why not? It will be the easiest solution of the problem of the high cost of living. And the credit belongs to Christian Science. Great!

Smart People In the Christian Science Church.

The argument is often advanced that Christian Science makes converts among the best elements, the most intelligent and enlightened members of the community. Among its devotees you find lawyers, judges, educators, men of affairs, etc. The question is: What is your standard of intelligence and enlightenment? The kind of opinions—religious, metaphysical, sociological, etc.—that a man holds should be considered a fair test of that man's mentality. A man who in this age believes in witchcraft, the evil eye, signs and omens, the divine right of kings, and hugs similar delusions and superstitions, would not be considered a man of great intelligence, no matter what mental accomplishments he might have, or how successful a man of affairs he might be.

A man may be well informed along certain lines in which his opinion may be worth considerably, while in certain other lines, and on many other subjects, his ideas may not be worth any more than those of the ordinary man of the street. Take anyone of our powerful industrial magnates, our great captains of industry. They are very clever and capable in their own way, and have been very successful in their spheres of endeavor. Yet of what value are their opinions on theological, philosophic, or literary questions?

There is a man in the Northwest who has established for himself a national reputation as a great railroad builder, or empire builder, as he is popularly called. Granting that he can talk authoritatively on the subject of railroad building and railroad management, and on other financial and industrial questions, who would care to be guided by his opinions on political, social, or educational questions? When now and then he does deliver himself of his opinions on such matters, thinking people pay no more attention to them than they would to those of any ordinary man.

Such a man's opinions are generally the product not of his clear thinking, not of his quest of truth, but of his character, his peculiar prejudices, his own position in the world, his selfish ambition. He judges the value of modern education, for instance, by the test whether or not high school graduates make efficient clerks in his railroad offices. He does not realize the fact that a young man may be poorly qualified for a clerkship in an office, but highly gifted in some other direction. What are the religious opinions of a successful lawyer or bank cashier worth?

Christian Science Arguments from the Old Testament.

As is the case with all new religions and sects in modern times, certain texts of the Bible are resorted to by Christian Science for the support of its doctrines; for the new doctrines must be in accord with the old Scriptures. The following are culled from the Old Testament, which, it is thought, as the Bible of the Jews, ought to carry conviction to the Jew. "God said, let us make man in our image and after our likeness." (Gen. 1:26.) It follows, so Christian Science says, that man is spirit, just like God. It forgets, however, that in the very next chapter we are told that God created man out of the dust of the earth. Surely the dust of the earth is not spirit. We can by no stretch of the imagination conceive of spiritual dirt.

Again: "God saw everything that He had made, and behold, it was very good." (Gen. 1:31.) Hence, if God's creation is very good, Christian Science argues, there can be no evil in it, no sin, disease, or pain. But it forgets all that the same book says in the following chapters. Adam is guilty of an act of disobedience. That surely is sin. As a punishment he is thenceforth to eat of the fruit of the soil in sorrow all the days of his life. That surely is evil. He is also told that as he is dust, so to dust must he return. Mother Eve is told that her sorrow will be greatly multiplied. All that is evil.

In fact the whole Old Testament history is meant to be one continuous illustration of the fact that sin is visited by severe punishment, unless man repents and mends his conduct. Hence there is sin and there is consequent evil. The stories of the flood, the Tower of Babel, Sodom and Gomorrah, Jacob's sons, Pharaoh and the Egyptians, the many rebellions of the Israelites in the desert, etc., to the very last chapter of Bible history—all bear testimony to the Bible doctrine of the existence of sin and evil. Jesus himself, the prototype of Mrs. Eddy, the first great discoverer of the "wonderful truths" of Christian Science, is made to suffer agony upon the cross. What else does His cry of despair mean: "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?"

Why, then, select only a few verses of the Old Testament which seem to support Christian Science ideas, and ignore all the others that flatly contradict them? We might as well say that the Old Testament everywhere teaches that God hardens man's heart in order to punish him for it, since in the story of the Exodus we repeatedly read that God hardened Pharoah's heart. (Ex. 7:3, et passim.) But, then, what becomes of the God-good idea of Christian Science?

Equally, what becomes of the other doctrine of Christian Science that all is spirit, nothing is matter, and hence evil or disease cannot be cured by material means, when we turn to the Old Testament for proof and support? In the Book of Exodus the story is told of the Israelites' three days' journey through the wilderness of Shur, where they could find no water to drink. They finally came to Marah, but the waters of the place were bitter. Thereupon God pointed out a tree to Moses, which tree he threw into the waters and sweetened them. (Ex. 15:22-25.) Why did not Moses give the waters absent treatment, or make the Israelites read some such revelation as Science and Health, in order to turn the bitter waters sweet? Why use a material tree, if "nothing is matter?"

In the Second Book of Kings there is a similar story, showing that the prophet Elisha, too, was no believer in Christian Science. The sons of the prophets had cooked some pottage, but they could not eat it, for "there was death in the pot," evidently some poison, Elisha ordered some meal to be thrown into it, and there was no more harm in the pot. (II K. 4:38-41.) No evidence here that Elisha believed that "nothing is matter."

Christian Science refers to the Old Testament as repeatedly teaching that God heals. Hence material cures are unnecessary. But the Old Testament also teaches that God feeds the hungry, sets the captives free, etc. Hence, why exert ourselves to obtain food, to work for a living? Why fight for liberty? Evidently there is something wrong with the Christian Science interpretation of the Old Testament.

Christian Science Real Support from the New Testament.

Christian Science is more fortunate and more successful in its quest of New Testament texts for its support, of which texts it makes more abundant and effective use. In fact, as far as the New Testament is concerned, Christian Science finds in it its real arsenal. Christian Science is truly Christian, in so far as it is a logical outgrowth of New Testament teaching, its logical application. In one respect it is more Christian than any other branch of Christianity, since it has built up its system out of a New Testament element which all others have with the most convenient inconsistency ignored.

A Christian Science authority says: "Mrs. Eddy maintains that it is in strict accord with the teaching of Jesus Christ and His apostles, and that it urderlies all the miracles of the Bible. During the brief period of His ministry Jesus broke all the laws of matter; He constantly threw contempt upon all material things; He healed the sick in direct contradiction to all recognized laws of medical science; He said 'the flesh profiteth nothing.' (John 6:63.) Yet He also said, 'I came down from heaven, not to do mine own will, but the will of Him who sent me.' (John 6:38), and St. John says of Him, 'For this purpose the Son of God was manifested, that He might destroy the works of the devil.' (I. John 3:5.) The same teaching runs through the Epistles, where matter, or the flesh, is constantly taken as a type of all that is opposed to God. Nothing can be stronger than the statement of St. Paul on this subject: "The flesh lusteth against the Spirit, and the Spirit against the flesh: and these are contrary the one to the other.' (Gal. 5:17.) 'So, then, they that are in the flesh cannot please God.' (Rom. 8:8.) 'Now this I say, brethren, that flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God.' (I. Cor. 15:50.) Thus Christian Science maintains that it has Scriptural authority for the teaching that matter does not proceed from God, but is the outcome of evil; in other words, an illusion of mortal mind."—(C. Lilias Ramsey, in Cyclopedia of Ethics and Religion.)

I shall not enter into a dispute with this Christian Science authority as to the interpretation of the above quoted texts from the New Testament. May be his is the only correct one, and his deductions, therefore, logical. Hence, Christian Scientists are doing exactly what Jesus himself is supposed to have done, and what he ordered his disciples and followers to do. For he said: "And these signs shall follow them that believe; in my name shall thou cast out devils; they shall speak with new tongues; they shall take up serpents; and if they drink any deadly thing, it shall not hurt them; they shall lay hands on the sick, and they shall recover." (Mk. 16:17 ff.) "Verily, verily, I say unto you, he that believeth in me, the works that I do shall he do also; and greater works than these shall he do; because I go unto my father." (John 14:12.)

Jesus healed the sick and the lepers, raised the dead, drove out evil spirits, and bade his followers do the same. Why should they not do it? Christian Scientists, therefore, are in this one respect true followers of Jesus, which cannot be said of any other Christian sect. They have all, from the very first, ignored the curative element of Jesus' teaching as something either preposterous, or non-essential, or impossible.

Of course, Christian Scientists are just as humanly inconsistent in their Christianity as all other Christian sects. Jesus did and taught many other things which they do not even attempt to do. He walked on the water, drove out devils, fed large multitudes on five loaves and two fishes, and rose from the grave. He taught that evil should not be resisted, that a rich man could not enter the Kingdom, etc., etc. These teachings Christian Scientists ignore just as nonchalantly as do other Christian churches. Alas, we cannot expect consistency of human beings, even of such as are rid of "mortal mind and mortal error!"

Yes, Christian Science is thoroughly Christian. The above quoted authority says: "In his warfare with evil, the Christian Scientist takes the life of Jesus Christ as his only example. He understands that Jesus was the Savior because he revealed the Christ, the spiritual idea of God; that Jesus proved by his life and works that it is the Christ or Truth revealed—the spiritual, eternal nature of God and man touching human consciousness—which takes away the sin of the world. Hence the constant endeavor of the Scientist is that he may be also governed by that Christ; in other words, that he may have 'this mind . . . which was also in Christ Jesus.' (Ph. 2:5.)

(To be concluded.)

A Sketch by Jacob Furth

Published In the Missouri Historical Society Collections

This sketch is intended to be a tribute to one whom it was my pleasure to know and to honor for many years. I am free to admit that many of my ideals, many of my actions, and, above all, many of my convictions and conceptions are largely due to the teachings of this great and good man.

The story of his life will fill many an important page in the history of our country, our state, our city and our people. Modest and unassuming though he was, he could not help being recognized as a leader of thought. Without the advantage of physical development he commanded the respect and admiration of those who came in contact with him, and this respect and admiration grew as he became better known.

Strong in his faith and loyal to the traditions of his ancestors, he was what might be termed a citizen of the world; no creed, no sect, no country, no party could wholly claim him. He was an advocate of justice, freedom and tolerance. He was one to whom distress might prefer its suit; to whom the wrongs, the tribulations and the vicissitudes of others appealed intensely. He was a father to the fatherless; a humanitarian and a lover of men in the broadest and noblest sense of the term.

The dignity of labor found in him a powerful advocate; the rights of the oppressed found in him a fearless champion. He lived respected and he died regretted, mourned by thousands. The individuality of his work is indelibly impressed upon the legislation, the history and the achievements of his time and generation.

Born in the City of Prague, the capital of Bohemia, on January 15th, 1822, he died August 5th 1898, in the City of St. Louis, where he had lived since 1849.

When he was about seven years old he was seriouly injured and almost crippled for life as the result of burns received at a conflagration.

As was the custom among well-to-do people of those times, he attended neither school nor college, but received his education at the hands of private tutors. At an early age he made the acquaintance of and became quite friendly with some of the most noted Jewish scholars of his time.

In 1837, when but fifteen years of age, his family removed from Prague to Vienna and there established a printing house. He applied himself with energy to the business and soon developed a taste for literature. The firm of Von Schmit & Bush became one of the largest publishing houses of its kind in the world and issued many new and elegant editions of Bibles, Talmud and other Hebrew works.

In 1842 he published the "Jahrbuch Fuer Israeliten," which numbered among its contributors some of the most eminent Jewish writers of the time, though of widely different dogmatic views.

On May 7th, 1844, Isidor Bush married Theresa Taussig. At the breaking out of the revolution in March, 1848, he became zealously active in the advancement of this cause. He was a Liberal in politics and the failure of the movement compelled him, as it compelled so many others who espoused the cause of republican principles, to seek safety in flight. He sought refuge and found it in the land that has been the haven of refuge to the oppressed of all nations, that vouchsafes liberty and the right of individual thought to all; that has been and, I hope always will be, the home of the brave and of the free; our own glorious country, the United States of America.

On January 8th, 1849, he arrived in the City of New York with his wife and child. He opened a small stationery store at 411 Grand street in that city and on March 30th, 1849, issued the first number of a German Jewish paper known as "Israel's Herald." This was the first Jewish weekly published in the United States. The enterprise was unsuccessful and had to be given up after three months of hard struggle.

In 1849 Isidor Bush removed to St. Louis where he continued to reside the remainder of his life. With Charles Taussig he opened a general store at Carondelet, South St. Louis, which business was continued for about six years.

In 1853 his father joined him and subsequently the firm of Bush & Taussig was established in the wholesale grocery business. In 1857 he was elected president of the Peoples' Savings Bank, which office he held until 1863.

Following the election of President Lincoln and the secession of a number of Southern states from the Union, a state convention having been called for the purpose of taking the State of Missouri out of the Union, he was nominated and elected a member of this convention on the Union ticket. The convention deposed the governor and the legislature of the state, established a provisional government for Missouri, and the state was saved to the Union. The convention met from time to time for about three years and Isidor Bush was chosen a member of a committee of nine, one from each Congressional district, to whom the most important matters were referred.

In 1861 General John C. Fremont being in command of the Western Department, with headquarters at St. Louis, he invited Isidor Bush to become a member of his staff and he became aid-de-camp with the rank of captain. He resigned this position in November of that year.

He submitted to Salmon P. Chase, then Secretary of the Treasury, a plan for a popular government loan which, while favorably reported by the department, failed to receive the sanction and indorsement of Secretary Chase. Bush received a government position which however, he soon resigned to accept the position of general freight and passenger agent of the St. Louis & Iron Mountain Railroad, which position he held for three years.

In 1864 he was elected a member of the state convention called in that year for the purpose of passing an ordinance for the emancipation of the slaves in Missouri and for disfranchising those who had taken up arms against the government. This convention framed a state constitution which was adopted against the strong opposition of the minority, which included Isidor Bush.

The wisdom of his views was borne out by the consequences ,which resulted in the removal of the dominant party from power and the repeal of the constitution in 1875. Bush received many tempting political offers, but he declined them all except the position of membership in the Missouri State Board of Immigration. He accepted this position because he was then engaged in work of a similar character, having been for nearly twelve years president of the German Immigrant Aid Society of St. Louis.

In 1868 he retired from the office which he held with the Iron Mountain Railroad Company and devoted himself to vine culture. He established nurseries upon a tract of land which he had acquired at a point about twenty miles south of St. Louis, now known as Bushberg. He did business there under the firm name of Bush & Son & Meissner. He also established a wholesale wine and liquor business at St. Louis under the firm name of Isidor Bush & Co. He devoted a great deal of time and study to vine culture and his Bushberg Catalogue, a grape manual, became so well and so favorably known that it was translated into many languages, and his writings on the subject of vine culture are recognized as valuable contributions and brought him, not only fame and glory, but also substantial financial returns.

Isidor Bush became an acknowledged authority and was recognized by men like Marshall P. Wilder, president of the American Pomological Society, P. Barry, vice-president of the American Pomological Society, William Saunders, superintendent of the Experimental Station, United States Department of Agriculture; Robert Manning, secretary Massachusetts Agricultural Society; Professor P. J. Burrill, president of the Illinois Industrial University, and many other leading men of this and foreign countries. In a letter to him dated Denison, Texas, September 1, 1883, Professor T. V. Munson writes as follows: "I think your modesty in simply calling it a catalogue does this great work an injustice. It is a most complete and valuable treatise on American grapes."

Isidor Bush was a mathematician of no ordinary degree. He devoted a great deal of his time to actuarial work and became well known throughout the country as a life insurance actuary. As such he was officially connected with the German Life Insurance Company of this city.

In 1878 he published the pamphlet, "Fraternal Endowment," which, together with his magazine and newspaper articles on the subject and his reports as chairman of the Covenant Endowment Fund of the Independent Order B'nai B'rith, constitute important contributions to the study and history of fraternal endowments. Not only in his writings, but in his intercourse with mankind and particularly with the unfortunate of his own faith, a peculiar kindness and affability was discernible at all times. As was said of his descriptions of the great number of American wines, so it may also be said that in contact with his fellowmen he was:

"To all their faults a little blind,
To all their virtues very kind."

He framed the endowment law of District No. 2, Independent Order B'nai B'rith, but refused to become a beneficiary under it. After having paid his assessments, he designated that his endowment be paid to the lodge for the benefit of such poor members who may not be financially able to pay their endowment dues.

The great institution on the shores of Lake Erie, the world-wide known and celebrated Jewish Orphan Asylum, Districts Nos. 2, 6 and 7, Independent Order B'nai B'rith, was loved by him as he loved his own family and it was duly remembered in his will.

Mr. Bush was for many years an active and enthusiastic member of the Missouri Historical Society. In 1882, he was chosen vice-president and served in that capacity until he declined re-election. He rendered to the society much valuable service, and he was second to none as a wise conselor.

During the latter years of his life his physical infirmities became more and more marked, his sufferings increased until, on the morning of the 5th of August, 1898, the heart which beat in love for all mankind was stilled and he joined the silent majority.

His funeral took place at 2 o'clock in the afternoon of Sunday, August 7th, 1898. Brief services having been conducted at the house in which he died, the remains were taken to Temple Shaare Emeth, where public services were held and the funeral oration delivered by Rev. Dr. Samuel Sale, the minister of that congregation. Mr. Samuel Bowman, representing District Grand Lodge No. 2, Independent Order B'nai B'rith, delivered an address in behalf of that order and district.

The remains were interred in the Bush family lot in Bellefontaine Cemetery with Masonic ceremonies.

By his will the executors of his estate—Jacob Furth, Frank Block and Raphael Bush, his son—were directed to execute numerous charitable bequests in keeping with the high ideals, the character and life work of Isidor Bush.

THE EXPOSITION AT SAN DIEGO.

We have been happily instrumental in obtaining recognition for the Independent Order B'nai B'rith at the hands of Director of Publicity, Mark S. Watson, of the Panama-California Exposition at San Diego, and a special day, either April 26 or 27, will be designated such, coincident with the visit of President Adolf Kraus and members of the Constitutional Grand Lodge and friends to the Quinquennial convention of that body in San Francisco. This is a matter of which our coreligionists of the country and especially of the Pacific Coast should take notice, and time their visit so that it shall fall on that occasion. They may visit as often as they desire, and we hope that they will come and come again, for they will receive a hearty Southern California welcome in the city of the harbor of the sun, but let them join the B'nai B'rith on the day specifically its own. No doubt a special program will be arranged and a round of special events planned. We shall have more to say later about this matter.—M. N. A. Cohen in the Jewish Tribune.

REFUSAL TO JEWISH OFFICE HOLDERS IN EGYPT.

Since the proclamation of the British protectorate over Egypt, several Jews who occupied important government posts, who enjoyed Austrian protection, have been dismissed. Among them is Goldstein Bey, the Postmaster General. Many Austrian and German Jews, quite a number who were natives of Trieste and entirely Italian in their sympathies, have been deported from Alexandria to Malta. Councilor Alfred Campos Bey was the only Jew, who had enjoyed Austrian protection, to remain. The local press energetically urged his retention owing to the great loss which the municipality would suffer were his valuable services dispensed with.

FORWARDING OF FUNDS TO PALESTINIAN REFUGEES.

The Provisional Executive Committee for General Zionist Affairs, of which Mr. Louis D. Brandeis is Chairman, has arranged through the Department of State to have the American Consulate at Alexandria act as a depositary and distributing agency for Americans who desire to send money to their relatives, who are among the refugees from Palestine.

The Provisional Committee will place on deposit with the American Consul at Alexandria, the sum of ten thousand dollars ($10,000.00) and will accept funds in New York, and it will cable advices to the American Consul to pay from its deposit. There will be no charge for the service, except the cost of the cable. Money will be accepted for transmission by mail or in person, at 44 East 23d street, New York.

THE JEWISH QUESTION

By Eugene H. Lehman, M. A.

In the fifth chapter of the Second Book of Kings, we read the story of Naaman the leper. Naaman was a mighty man of valor, but he was a leper. A little Hebrew maid who had been taken captive from the land of Israel and made a slave in his household, said one day unto her mistress, "Would that my lord were with the prophet in Samaria; for he would cure him of his leprosy." So Naaman went and stood before the door of Elisha, the prophet of Samaria. And Elisha sent a messenger out to say to the haughty Syrian, "Go, wash in the Jordan seven times and be healed." But Naaman was wroth and went away and said, "Behold, I thought he would bid me do something difficult. Are not the Abana and Pharpar rivers of Syria far better than all the waters of Israel?" But his servants drew near and spake, "If the prophet had bid thee do some great thing. wouldst thou not have done it? How much rather then when he saith, "Wash and be clean?" So Naaman went down, dipped himself in the Jordan seven times and became healed.

If this little story here briefly outlined be read with sufficient care in the Bible itself, it will be observed that it contains the four characteristics essential to the solution of the Jewish question. It will be noted in the first place, that the incident is pervaded with a lofty spirit of idealism, for Elisha seeks to treat not merely the physical but also the spiritual ailment of his patient; next that the event is international in scope, since it involves the most prominent leaders of both Israel and Syria; thirdly, that the fresh breeze of democracy enlivens the narrative, for it honors equally slaves, servants, soldiers, kings and prophets; and finally that the remedy proposed is practical, for it yields the desired results.

In the present paper, we shall undertake to show that the solution of the Jewish question must be characterized by these four essentials—idealism, internationalism, democracy, and practicableness. We shall attempt to cover our subject by venturing into the three following fields of inquiry: (1) What is the Jewish question? (2) Why is there a Jewish question? (3) What is not, and what is, the solution of the Jewish question?

I. What Is the Jewish Question?

The Jewish question may be couched in the following words: Can the Jews continue to live in the modern world, and remain Jews? Or perhaps better, the question might be put thus: Can Judaism persist? It is here taken for granted that there is something richly deserving persistence in the religion that gave to the world the Law, the Prophets and the Holy Writings. Such persistence will continue to be merited unitl that happy day arrives when man has learned not merely to repeat, but to do, the Commandments; not merely to admire the beauty of the poetry, but also to express in daily conduct, the sentiment of the Psalms; not merly to go into raptures over the spirituality portrayed in Sargent's picture of the prophets of Israel, but also to manifest in our attitude toward God and man the teachings of these seers.

II. Why Is There a Jewish Question?

At first sight, one is puzzled by the fact that such a thing as the Jewish question even exists. Since the modern world not only admits, but extols, the lofty ethical and religious ideals of the Jews as set forth in the Old Testament, one would naturally assume that that same world, far from putting obstacles in the way, would actually assist to its uttermost, every honest attempt made on the part of the Jews to reduce to practice those ideals.

But this natural assumption is erroneous; for there are at present chiefly two forces that are patently working against the persistence of Judaism—one force working consciously and the other unconsciously. The conscious force is the missionary movement; the unconscious force lies in the fact that the children of Israel constitute only a minority in any given nation.

The efforts made by the Christian missionaries to throttle the life out of Judaism are productive of startling results. According to the statistics furnished by Rev. A. E. Thompson, in his book, "A Century of Jewish Missions," we are lead to believe that during the nineteenth century, the disciples of Judaism "converted" to Christianity exceeded in numbers those lost in this way by any other religion. Mr. Thompson informs us that during the hundred years just closed only one Moslem in every five hundred and twenty-five adopted Christianity, while during the same period [illegible] in every one hundred and fifty- [illegible] baptized into either Catholocism or Protestantism. As long as there is a missionary movement, so long will there be a Jewish question.

The unconscious force that threatens the persistence of Judaism lies in the fact that we are everywhere in the minority. Rightly or wrongly, the civilized world regards itself as Christian, although that Christianity must be interpreted broadly enough to include at the same time a Czar's program, a Kaiser's aggressions, and a President's prayer for universal peace.

For the descendants of Abraham, likewise the world is Christian in the sense that, in some parts, it is anti-Jewish; in all parts, it is non-Jewish. Even in the most favored lands, the government of the nation, state and city, the business, the school and the home—all life is necessarily and properly built so as to conform to the wishes of the majority, and that majority is not of Semitic origin. Now, despite the fact that minorities are often in the right it is always difficult, and frequently impossible for this unpopular protesting faction to maintain its existence. Weaklings begin the desertion, and, after a generation or two, the ranks of even the stoutest evidence an inclination to waver. The historical principle then, that majorities manifest a tendency to swallow up minorities, forces itself upon the Jewish question.

III. What Is Not, and What Is, the Solution of the Jewish Question?

We have said that the solution to the Jewish question must possess four characteristics — idealism, internationalism, democracy, practicableness. Let us now examine a little more closely these characteristics.

1. No solution to our question can be permanent that does not embrace a lofty, perhaps an unattainable, ideal. The life of the Jewish people from the time that Abraham beheld the vision of his descendants exceeding in numbers the sands of the sea, up to the day when Herzl dreamed the dreams of a re-established home in Palestine—during all these centuries, the life of the Jew is nought else but the record of ideal building. Every chapter not merely in the Old Testament, but also in post-biblical literature, is a description not so much of an existent actuality, as of a future hope. Indeed, the Prophets gave to the world the most sublime ideal that ever sprung from the soul of man—the ideal of the Messiah and of the Messianic era.

A people that has not only sustained itself on visions, but that has also inspired dreams in the founders of Christianity and of Mohammedanism—such a people must perish from off the face of the earth, unless its young men are allowed to give their imaginations free play. In very truth, Israel's sons and daughters must dream dreams. Left to itself, their ideal-creating faculty may behold the nightmares of an Emma Goldman; properly guided, it may conceive of a time when nations shall beat their swords into plowshares and their spears into pruning hooks.

2. No solution to our question can be adequate, unless it is international in the most complete sense of that term. It must possess the power to reach out its hand to the uttermost parts of the earth. Wherever a Jew is, no matter how large the city, or small the village—there, if necessary, we must be able to come to his aid, and to come quickly. Indeed, it is primarily through this second characteristic that Judaism is to overcome its numerical weakness; for, while it remains true that we are everywhere in the minority, we would be, if we concentrate our entire force in any single spot—we would in that particular place be in the majority.

3. No solution to our question can be universal, unless it is thoroughly democratic. If there is any one ideal to which the Jews throughout their long history have clung more tenaciously than to any other—save that of religion—that ideal is democracy. No self-appointed committee or group of men, regardless of their qualifications, has ever been permitted to speak for the Jewish masses. Moses, though commissioned by the Lord, dared not venture to act as the spokesman for his enslaved brethren, until properly authorized so to do by the representatives of the people. David, though it was known that he had been divinely pre-destined for the throne, was compelled to wait patiently for many a bitter year, until the delegates of all the tribes would elect him king over a united Israel.

4 No solution to our question can be dependable, unless it is marked by the characteristic of practicability. Ideal-loving and long-suffering though the Jewish people may be, they none the less manifest in their history that contrary quality of impatiency in awaiting results. Yet this is not at all surprising in a race whose life and literature furnishes a constant exception to every rule. The Jews follow only those leaders behind whose promises there soon becomes visible and tangible a real building of brick and mortar.

Where then are we to look for a solution that is characterized by these four essentials? Many movements have been launched and have attained formidable proportions —movements intended to furnish in whole or in part the answer to our question. It is usually sought to apply the curative properties of these remedies to the disease of anti-Semitism. Let us examine for a moment three of the most important of these proposed solutions. Each has declared war against anti-Semitism. but each conducts its campaign according to different principles of strategy.

The first is the solution fathered primarily by Prof. Herman Strack of the University of Berlin. It is an easy matter, declares Prof. Strack, to get rid of the prejudice against the Jew. All you have to do is to get rid of the Jew! Hence, assimilate; become Christians. This solution is idealistic, international, democratic—but not practical.

The second proposed solution likewise declares that it is easy to get rid of anti-Semitism. All you have to do is to run away from it! This is the program of the Zionists. These enthusiastic followers of Herzl are deserving of the highest praise for the persistent efforts they tirelessly put forth in the interest of their cause. Their movement is both ideal and democratic; but it is not practical, nor indeed, international, in the special sense in which we are here using that word. It is practical only in so far as it can actually improve the condition of the Jews in Palestine. It is impractical in its central ambition; for with the passing of every day, the opportunity seems to grow more and more remote, for the establishment of a legally assured home in Palestine.

Zionism is not in the widest sense international; for it attempts to do only one thing—and that for only a limited number of people. The cause makes its most vital appeal only to that small body of Jews who are willing to return to the land of their fathers. A truly international movement, as we now conceive it, must be empowered to render any assistance to any Jew living anywhere. At best Zionism is a solution of a Jewish question, but not the solution of the Jewish question.

A third group of men has offered us a plan for getting rid of anti-Semitism. All we have to do, they say, is to rise above it. This is the program presented by Liberal Judaism. Our modern pulpits proclaim the truth, when they preach that if we live up to the ethical standards of the prophets, we will in time break down prejudice and perhaps win the respect and even admiration of our neighbors. But Reform Judaism is not international; for it flourishes only in the United States, merely lives in England, barely exists in Germany and has not been born elsewhere. Whatever other merits it may have, the movement is not practical as the solution of the Jewish question; for even in the United States, it will apparently require centuries of preaching before the Jews make an appreciable advance in their lives toward the prophetic standards, and perhaps centuries more, before our neighbors accord us the respect and admiration merited by those who practice such lofty ethical teachings. But further, precisely among those nations where our question is in most urgent need of an immediate solution—precisely in these diseased spots, the followers of Geiger can not apply their remedy.

Since neither Assimilation, nor Zionism, nor Liberal Judaism offers a complete solution to our problem, where then are we to look for the solution—the solution marked by the four essential characteristics? The answer to our question lies near at hand —indeed, very near. We would found no new movement; for happily, one already exists with its machinery in good running order, amply able to make it possible for both Jews and Judaism to persist in the modern world. It is our duty merely to see that the machinery produces the desired result. The essence of our proposal consists in this: instead of seeking to found a legally assured home in Palestine, we would establish an Invisible Jewish State everywhere.

This Invisible Jewish State would consist of a racial, religious and social service union of all Jews living upon the habitable globe. It would be a commonwealth without land; a republic without a homogeneous people; a nation without army and navy. In brief, it would be a spiritual United States of Jewry.

This is not an Utopian dream; for, remember, we have said that such a State already exists. And so it does. It is better known to us under a different name—the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith. The solution of the Jewish question is to be sought for nowhere else than in our own lodge meetings. B'nai B'rithism more truly than any sister movement is characterized by the four essentials demanded by the solution to our question.

The Independent Order of B'nai B'rith is sublimely idealist in its program. That idealism is given noble expression in the Preamble of our Constitution. The men who penned that preamble could behold the visions of our race and could choose phrases befitting world statesmen. It is impossible to conceive of a movement dedicated to a purpose more exalted than that which is the raison d'etre of our Order. The lengths to which this idealism may be carried is evidenced by the fact that it permits us to dream of the establishment of a spiritual United States of Jewry.

The Independent Order of B'nai B'rith is international—international in the biggest, broadest and truest sense of that word. It is international not merely from a geographical point of view, but international in the scope of work in which it may engage.

The Independent Order of B'nai B'rith is thoroughly democratic. It is not a self-constituted body that has taken upon itself the authority to speak for Jewry. It is not an organization open to some and closed to others. It is a body into which every Jew may enter provided only that he is of good moral character and of proper age. When once admitted to membership, his rights and privileges are no more and no less than those enjoyed by every other brother. The heights to which he may rise are dependent not on his social standing nor on his wealth, but solely on his personal merit and his devotion to service. The present leaders throughout are those who have risen step by step from the ranks. Probably no example of a more thorough-going democracy ever existed than that furnished by the government of our Lodges.

The Independent Order of B'nai B'rith is a practical organization. It does things; it produces results. It has a record of more than seventy years of splendid achievement behind it. The Kishineff petition, the Peixotto mission, the abrogation of the treaty with Russia, the existence of homes, hospitals, orphan asylums, libraries. schools and other philanthropic institutions in every corner of the globe, proclaim the fact that ours is an Order that builds its ideas in bricks and mortar.

But the present article is not intended to be merely another eulogy upon the B'nai B'rith. Far from it; for we all have heard too many such eulogies. After due credit is given for its notable history, the Order still has much to achieve. Its accomplishments by no means equal its potentialities. B'nai B'rithism must become a more vital world movement—a world movement more forceful than Zionism, more potent than Liberal Judaism, more inclusive than any other movement in Jewry. This does not mean that we are to compete with any sister movement. On the contrary, those of us who believe in Zionism should aid that cause; those of us who believe in Orthodoxy or Reform should freely render assistance to that particular religious party. But B'nai B'rithism is to be greater than any of these; it is to be the spiritual United States of Jewry in which all of these activities may flourish, precisely as numerous political parties and movements flourish in the United States of America.

While the practical details of our program may form the subject of a second paper, it may here be added that the aim of these practical details is to raise the B'nai B'rith to a 100 per cent standard of efficiency. B'na iB'rithism must become a cause; nay more, it must become the Jewish cause. It should become as natural for every Jew to be born into membership into our Invisible State, as it is for every American to be born into citizenship into the United States. Our members need to be fired with loyalty, enflamed with zeal, inspired with enthusiasm. Our Order must become in actuality what it is now too largely only in name—the truly representative, fully authorized, and universally recognized World-Brotherhood of the Jews.

Our chief need is young men—men of vision and power who can rise above all petty selfishness and dedicate their minds and souls with untiring perseverance and self-resignation to a sublime cause, young men who can be developed into real world leaders. The call has come to our Order, as it came so frequently to our prophets of old—in a time of war. Will the B'nai B'rith close its ears to the divine voice and answer with the false prophet, "There he is; send him?" Or will the Order with its soul attuned so that it can behold the vision of the whole world filled with the glory of God, respond to this call to service, as did Isaiah, "Here am I, O Lord; send me?"

District Grand Lodge No. 1 held its 63rd annual convention at Worcester, Mass., on Sunday, Feb. 7, 1915. The Mayor of the city, the Governor of the state, and leading co-religionists of the city joined in a hearty welcome to the many delegates that were in attendance at the convention.

The convention was ushered in with a special service on Friday evening, Feb. 5th, at the leading synagogue, where Rev. Dr. Bernard M. Kaplan delivered the convention sermon. Fully a thousand people filled the sacred edifice.

Saturday night, in the beautiful ball room of the Bancroft Hotel, Worcester Lodge gave an informal reception in honor of the visiting delegates.

Sunday morning, after an invocation by Rabbi B. M. Kaplan, Mayor Wright welcomed the delegates in the name of the city. Dr. Jos. Silverman, President of the District, responded remarking that while the meeting was held on a Sunday, which the Puritan city strictly observes as its Sabbath, the nature and purpose of the convention were principally and primarily religious, patriotic and benevolent. The reading of the message of President Silverman followed. He referred feelingly to the sad condition prevailing among the coreligionists in the war-ridden countries. He reported on the work done by the lodges in the way of relief and emphasized the urgent need of continuing relief measures in aid of the sufferers abroad.

The principal business of the forenoon session was an appropriation of $1,000 towards the relief ship which the Zionists are planning to send to Palestine to carry food and provisions for the refugees, which action was taken after an appeal by Mr. Harry Cutler of Providence, Past President of the District Grand Lodge, followed by short addresses on the part of Brothers Herman Asher, Chas. Hartman, S. M. Roeder and J. H. Ullman, arousing the sympathies of the delegates in behalf of the sufferers in the holy land.

The standing committees were appointed and this was followed by the reading of the reports of the officers and chairmen of committees.

Class Initiation.

In the afternoon a large class of candidates was initiated by the degree team of Worcester Lodge. The ceremony was dignified and impressive. Worcester Lodge was awarded first prize for the greatest percentage of increase in membership and also the prize for having the best degree team. At the conclusion of the ritualistic work the Grand Lodge proceeded to the regular order of business.

A resolution was adopted commending President Wilson for his veto of the immigration bill. This action followed the report of a special committee to which was referred that part of the President's message dealing with immigration matters. A copy of the resolution was ordered engrossed and forwarded to President Wilson.

The election of officers was the next order of business and after a unanimous election the result was as follows:

Herman Asher of New York, president; Hon. Abraham K. Cohen of Boston, First Vice-President; Joseph Rosenzweig of New York, Second Vice-President; Sol. Sulzberger of New York, Treasurer; Rev. Dr. Bernard M. Kaplan of New York, Grand Secretary.

The election of Governors for the Home resulted as follows: Louis Kempner, President; Jacob Cane, William B. Koller, Edward Rosenfeld, Benjamin Kashman, Henry Gutenstein, Edward Sanders, Moses Minzesheimer, I. B. Schmidt.

The following were elected as delegates to the Constitution Grand Lodge which meets in San Francisco: Charles Hartman, Herman Asher, Simon M. Roeder, Sol. Sulzberger, Joseph H. Ullman, Charles M. Stern, Harry Cutler, Charles H. Shapiro, I. Irving Lipsitch, Jacob B. Klein, Edwin J. Goodhart, Henry Lasker, Morris L. Stern, Jacob S. Kuhns.

The officers were installed by Mr. Chas. Hartman, Past President of the District Grand Lodge and member of the Executive Committee of the Order for District No. 1.

Banquet.

In the evening a banquet was tendered to the delegates and visiting Grand Lodge officers at the Hotel Bancroft, which was attended by more than 350 guests. The after-dinner talks were marked by eloquence, earnestness and wit.

The following was the order of the speakers: Address of Welcome, Mr. Maurice L. Katz, President of the Worcester Lodge No. 600; Toastmaster, Mr. Archibald M. Hillman, Ex-President of Worcester Lodge: His Excellency the Governor, David I. Walsh; His Honor the Mayor, George M. Wright; Rev. Dr. Edward N. Calisch, Richmond, Va., member executive committee I. O. B. B.; Rev. Dr. Joseph Silverman of New York, President District Grand Lodge, No. 1, I. O. B. B.; Mr. Herman Asher, 1st Vice-President District No. 1 I. O. B. B.; Mr. Charles Hartman, New York, member executive committee I. O. B. B.; Judge A. K. Cohen, Boston, 2nd Vice-President District Grand Lodge No. 1 I. O. B. B.; Colonel Harry Cutler, Providence, R. I., Past President District Grand Lodge, No. 1, I. O. B. B.; Hon. Charles M. Stern, Albany, N. Y., Past President District Grand Lodge, No. 1, I. O. B. B.

Prayer was offered by Rev. Dr. B. M. Kaplan, the newly elected Secretary of the district.

MR. HERMAN ASHER,
President District Grand Lodge, No. 1, I. O. B. B.

We publish herewith extracts of some of the addresses delivered at the banquet.

"SADNESS AND SORROW."

Atty. Katz Speaks of Conditions in Europe.

Atty. Katz said:—

"While looking upon this gathering of happy men and women, a veil of sadness and sorrow comes over me as a contrasting picture of the condition of our Jewish and Gentile brethren across the great ocean presents itself, and I hope and pray that the holy and all-Powerful Father of us all will heed the cry of His chosen people and in His infinite wisdom cause the dulled senses and blurred vision of our brethren abroad, to become clear, so that instead of battling on, they will do their utmost to end this savage, inhuman and annihilating carnage and cause peace to become the word of greeting over the entire universe.

"I cherish the hope, and look forward with high anticipation, that these United States will be the human agent of our almighty God to speed peace and good will among all mankind, and that our blessed country will stand as a beacon light of wisdom, humanity and charity to the crippled nations of the eastern hemisphere.

"It will also be our aim, by our conduct and dealings with our neighbors, to blot out entirely the prejudice against the Jew and hasten the day when humanity shall know neither race nor creed, but love and sympathy will make this whole world akin and fill our hearts, thrilling in harmony with sublime relations of the great Creator.

"As soon as the news of the horrible butcheries and carnage of this inhuman war reached us, a cry of horror overspread the earth. Instantly every Jewish heart grew tense, a throb of sympathy beat responsive in every breast. Wide open flew our purses and, within a short time $1,000,000 was raised and hundreds of thousands are contributing daily to alleviate the untold sufferings of our brothers of the faith of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob.

"To that end we have all gathered in Worcester, an earnest band, to confer together and be reinforced and strengthened for even more helpful service in our several communities."

SECOND TO NONE.

President Hillman Speaks on Hebrews as Citizens.

President Hillman said:—

"As American citizens of Hebraic extraction we have been influenced by our prophets and our patriots. We have followed out the behest of Jeremiah, and have built homes, planted gardens, and have found peace because we have sought the peace of this, our glorious nation.

"We have become an integral part in the makeup of our Union, and as Americans, we stand second to no other group of citizens in the devotion of our country's weal. We stand ready to maintain, forever, our free institutions, reared as they have been, upon the altars of civil and religious liberty.

"In this land of our adoption, or nativity, our rights have been established, and our liberties made secure. We have assumed and discharged our responsibilities in government, not because of any qualities of adaptability, but because ideals of true democracy, of social justice, of law, and of equity, have become inherent in the Jew, by centuries of training and culture.

"A democracy does not endure by the shouting of equal rights of men. Every right bespeaks a duty, and it is the aim of every B'nai Brith to fulfill his obligations to the state.

"An orderly government is not the result of a day's work, but must be wrought out by each nation in a slow and patient process of time, so too, our order has been advanced by the perseverance and toil of our brethren, until today, it encircles the entire globe, and its power for good is far-reaching.

"We are meeting at a very critical time in human history, caused by the nations of Europe engaged in deadly combat, testing a civilization 2000 years bid. Slaughter, misery and destruction by war must end. The time is near at hand, let us hope, when the nations of Europe will gather in conference to draw new treaties of peace and commerce, and the fate of the Jewish people of Europe is of deep concern to us.

"Is it not necessary, therefore, that the machinery of our order be organized and directed for the purpose of securing political emancipation for our coreligionists in eastern Europe? Is it not high time that the inherent restrictions besetting the Jew in Russia and Roumania be forever removed, and that equal opportunity be extended to them to develop their latent talents in the arts and sciences, in the profesisons and in commerce?

GREETINGS OF STATE.

Gov. Walsh Praises Work of the Hebrew People.

Gov. Walsh was cheered to the echo when he was introduced by toastmaster Hillman. He said: "It is a great pleasure for me to bring to this gathering the greetings and congratulations of the commonwealth of Massachusetts, and to bring greetings to those who come to Massachusetts to plan and to deliberate for the purpose of making more useful this organization.

"For 40 years I have lived in this county, and during those years I have witnessed the struggles and labors of your people. I have seen you come here and taking the humblest and lowliest positions. Tonight I find in this hall men who stand high in the professions and business enterprises of this commonwealth. This is a body of men and women second to none in the commonwealth, and I am proud of my commonwealth and my country, because of what I have seen.

"I am proud of it for the reason that it is that flag which has given you opportunity and the field to exercise your religious freedom and freedom to exercise your talents for the success of the country and the state.

"No people in the world have suffered more; no people have been persecuted more. There have been laws in every country of the world to deprive you of your religion and your opportunity. Yet you refused to be conquered. Here in America you have reached your highest state of perfection and success. It means greater love and service for the country.

"Sometimes I think that men who come here from lands where they have been persecuted have a greater affection for our flag and our country than those who have lived here for generations, because you know what it is to have equality of opportunity, and because you find it here, you prize it. We love our flag for what it represents; the government of which that flag is our emblem.

"In the trenches of Europe millions of men are ready to give up their lives for love of their country. But their love differs from ours. They love their government and their flag because it means home. Our flag does not mean home alone to us. It tells no story of ancestry. That flag tells a story that no other flag tells to mankind. It promotes the happiness, wellbeing and prosperity of all the people who live in the government.

"Unlike other governments, this government promotes and advances the happiness of the individual. That is why we love our flag, why we are willing to die, because the stars and stripes gives more happiness and more freedom than any flag in the world.

"The proof is not in my words. Why did our fathers and mothers come here? Why have the oppressed of the world come here? They have come here because our flag gives them more hope, equality, opportunity, happiness and prosperity than any other flag in all the world.

"Your society is doing work that is part of the government work and I would be ashamed of the commonwealth of Massachusetts if one of its officials had not been sent here to welcome, cooperate and encourage this splendid society in its work, I would be ashamed of the people of your race if those who have become successful and wealthy did not reach out and help those in less fortunate circumstances.

"You can be no less loyal to the flag of our nation by being loyal to the race and history of the race of which you

THE PRESIDENT'S VETO.

The Immigration Bill which the President has sent back unsigned to Congress failed to pass over his veto. The President's message in which he sets forth the reasons for his action will remain a document which when the controversy is re-opened, as re-opened it probably will be, is destined to play a part. The President may be one and the Legislators of the nation many. But just because the one has been constitutionally empowered to offset the many, there must be inherent weight in the chief magistrate's stand which means nothing more and nothing less than that he has refused to "follow a multitude."

For the President has hit the nail on the head in declaring bluntly and clearly, as is his wont, that in restricting immigration the lawmakers in Congress cannot quote a direct mandate from the people. The bill, it is true, has been with us for some time. Its promoters have had their say and likewise have its antagonists been heard from. But the fact remains that no political party has avowed in platform or convention its advocacy of restriction in the form in which it has now been sprung upon us. We shall agree with the President as indeed we must, that if the American people wills shutting the door to the stranger its will must be enacted as law. But then it must be the people charging their representatives with that duty; the reverse, that the representatives of the people shall force their will upon the people, is inconceivable under our constitution. And if the American people is to speak out it must do so through the channels of platform and convention. The people must be called upon to pronounce upon a question which so radically runs counter to established policies, and to pronounce upon it in a manner direct and unequivocal. As the President puts it, the assent must be universal and conscious, and we ought first and foremost "to go to the country on it."

What the attitude of us Jews and in particular of this Order has been on the immigration question has been repeatedly set forth on this page. We Jews have the least to fear from the literacy test. For the illiterates among us are relatively speaking the fewest. If we oppose restriction it is not on the ground of selfish or sectional motives. This is indeed the only proper attitude to any and every question that may agitate the American people, of whom we are a part. Our country is so vast, stretching over a continent, a measure adopted to remedy an evil in one section of the country may work harm in another or be fraught with danger to the whole of the people. The right kind of legislation will bear in mind the needs of all and seek to accomplish the greatest good for the greatest number. We may be divided locally, geographically; we may also be divided racially, ethnographically. For we are a composite people of varying ancestries and traditions. It is our hope and boast that out of the many there shall arise one. But the welding together of heterogeneous stocks into one nation is one thing and the unwarranted assumption on the part of the stock to dominate the others quite another. But racial questions are of smaller moment in this controversy. What is behind the whole agitation is sectionalism, the sectionalism of interests which however necessary a component in the nation do not and cannot be said to stand for the nation itself. Tyranny cannot be tolerated on this continent, and be it the tyranny of the labor unions bolstered up by the learned and one-sided economists in university chairs.

Let the matter come to the direct attention of the whole American people. Let each and every citizen determine for himself after listening to both sides as to whether he favors restriction or a liberal attitude in the question of immigration. As a matter of fact, the danger of over immigration is not acute just now. With Europe in the throes of war, with the flower of its youth slain and maimed, with a decreased density of population, we may expect that before long the European governments will enact legislation to restrict emigration. And as for the specious plea that the strong and healthy will be retained at home and that the aged and enfeebled will be dumped upon our shores, that is clearly a chimera to which the restrictionists cling as to a last straw. For the laws which now stand on the statute book are ample to safeguard us on that score. New laws are not needed.

The chief objection to the Immigration Bill is its indirection. And that literacy test is the poorest of all tests is clear beyond all doubt. It may keep out the desirable immigrant who is possessed of brawn, strength of body and strength of character, albeit his education has been sadly neglected. It will be inoperative in the case of the educated scoundrel. And as for the attempt to shut the door against so-called revolutionaries, it means a reversal of all our national policies which made this the land of the free and of this country the haven of those who fled from tyranny and autocratic oppression. The American people cannot and will not go back upon its cherished principles, even though our legislators for the time being choose to forget them in wanton obedience to sectional pressure.

IN THE SERVICE OF ISRAEL'S CAUSE.

When a great catastrophe overwhelms a section of Jewry, when an emergency arises calling for the highest measure of assertion, the summons goes forth for conjoint committees and such like organizations with which is coupled the lament that we Jews are woefully disorganized. That a people scattered and dispersed over the whole world should lack permanent forms of universal organization would, if it were true, occasion no wonderment. If we are not mistaken, in times of peace, that is when there is peace in Israel, the plea is usually made that each group of Jewry is self-sufficient, with problems of its own, with an allegiance circumscribed by national boundaries. When impudent anti-Semitism raises the cry that Judaism is international, Jewish leaders are in the habit of pointing to the want of universal organization as a proof to the contrary. We are in a peculiar situation and in a stranger frame of mind: we boast of disorganization and want organization. And when within our camps the party watchwords are debated, academically it is true, and the question is mooted, What are we? race, nation, or religious community? we are apt for the love of phrases to forget the reality of things, we seek shadows and darken the issue which is plain as daylight.

For looking the facts squarely in the face we are organized in a variety of ways. If we take ourselves as we are and refrain from losing ourselves in vain theoretical questions, if we look upon ourselves as practical men ought to do, we shall observe that though we recognize the duties to the many fatherlands and show our readiness to defend the flags of the various nations to whom we are knitted by ties of interest, association, language and culture, we nevertheless represent a body held together by a sum of traditions peculiarly our own which we cherish tenaciously as the heritage of our fathers, by our religion which makes us one the world over. Out of this situation arises a dual aspect: we are Germans, Frenchmen, Americans, etc., but we are Jews. Whether it would be desirable for the world or not that within a state all citizens should worship God after one and the same fashion, is altogether beside the mark. As things are, the Northern nations of Europe attempted something of that kind and have not succeeded. Protestantism may have tended in that direction; but Protestant Germany and England harbor Catholics, and Catholicism is international. Religion must transcend the tutelage of the state if a religion is to stand watch over the highest interests of mankind and curb the greed of nations. Religion divides the inhabitants of a country and unites mankind across political boundaries.

Why we Jews have been placed in the dispersion is an idle question except for the theologians, and the theologians are divided on the question. While the bulk of Jewry cries out: Because of our sins we were exiled, and because of our repentance we shall be led back, a faction avers that the dispersion is final and has been providentially ordained. Now it is not for the layman to decide so momentous a question But that we are in the dispersion, we all know. That we have interests in common, we also know. That our heart bleeds at the tortures and misfortunes of the Jewish brother, we know and feel beyond any doubt. As unsophisticated Jews, "our people" means to us fellow-Jews of the dispersion. And so from time immemorial we have kept in touch with the dispersed of our people. We organize locally. We have also world organizations. For be it remembered, organization always overlaps. The free citizen meets his like within and without the nation. American lawyers fraternize with Canadians and American scholars with European. A Jew, the normal Jew, is member of a synagogue and lodge at the same time. In the present state of conditions, the synagogue divides those whom the lodge unites. But that there is any hostility between the two is a fabrication unsupported by facts. The two merely overlap. In the synagogue our nearer brother is he who acknowledges the same ritual. In the lodge, all Jews are brothers. Our Order is American to the core in all its American lodges, and German in German lodges and Ottoman in the Orient. But we are internationally Jewish in our scope. Our Judaism has never clashed with our patriotism. Indeed the two cannot collide. For Judaism teaches duty to country. But Judaism has a message to all mankind. Judaism moreover has its votaries all over the world. For specifically Jewish interests we are united and for nothing else.

That in times of distress the fellow-feeling is aroused to a higher degree is a matter calling for no comment. It is self-evident. When Jewish suffering is to be alleviated, by whom shall it be done if not by the Jew? Naturally that body will be the best prepared for dealing with the situation which in times of peace has made adequate preparation, has built up that organization which it is vain to attempt to create over night. We of the Order cheerfully and readily give credit to any and every organization having the service of Israel's cause for its object. We shall continue to do service in our own way. The guardian of Israel is He who sleepeth not nor slumbereth. No one among us has the claim to the post of God's vicegerent. We have many watchmen. So long as they do not fall out among themselves and in the quest of vain glory wantonly attack each his neighbor, Israel's cause will be looked after. Let the men of Israel stand ready to hold council in synagogue and lodge and federation and the women of Israel in their chosen gatherings, there is a field for every one of us, whether it be the narrower activity in city and country or the wider across seas and the bounds of nations. To all Jewish organizations for the improvement of the lot of the Jew along material or spiritual lines, the Order extends its best wishes. And if a word of advice be in place, let no organization in the service of Israel's cause forget that no individual is greater than the organization and that the supreme test of all efforts is the stability and welfare of the Jewish people here and abroad.

WE ARE NOT DECEIVED.

A letter written by our distinguished Brother, Dr. Paul Nathan of Berlin, to Dr. Timendorfer, President of District Grand Lodge No. 8, is published in this issue. Dr. Nathan mildly criticizes us for reprinting editorials of certain American publications which comment favorably on Russia's alleged promise to deal justly with the Jewish subjects after the war is over. Dr. Nathan calls attention to the fact that the Jews of the countries now at war are not in a position to do anything for the Russian Jews, that the only help for them must come from America, and hence that it would be a misfortune to the Russian Jews if Russia should succeed in deceiving the American people.

Dr. Nathan need have no fear on that score. It is customary in this country, in order to keep the readers posted as to current events, for reputable journals to publish not only their own views but also the views of other papers even though the latter may be in conflict with those of the paper which republishes them. Such custom has little effect on public opinion. The B'nai B'rith News is not, never was, and while present conditions exist never can be, pro Russian. As much can be said not only for every Jewish publication in this country, but also for more than nine-tenths of the secular press. As far as we are concerned, we do not believe, and never did believe, that Russia officially made a promise to repeal any of its hundreds of barbaric laws applicable to Jews only, and even if some of its officials when the war broke out promised better times to come, it was done, as we believe, solely for the purpose of maintaining the status quo while it was attending to business more immediately urgent than the persecution of the Jews, and in which it might need their help. "When the devil was sick, the devil a monk would be; when the devil got well, the devil a monk was he." "My beloved Jews" are now used by the Russians for "Kanonenfutter." What will happen after the war? If Russia loses, its officials will invent some charge to put the blame upon the Jews and demand vengeance. If it wins it will celebrate. But how? What can be expected of a country in which a commanding officer's apology for the hanging of an inoffensive, law-abiding Jew was that the soldiers were entitled to some enjoyment; a country in which the leaders of a pogrom selected Jewish maidens for a fate worse than death, robbed and pillaged Jewish stores and homes, murdered men in cold blood; a Christian country, so-called, in which the governing church does not raise its voice against such crimes; a country in which a charge of ritual murder was brought against poor Beilis, and after he was found not guilty by a peasant jury the government decorated his prosecutors and disbarred the attorney who had the courage to defend him. We cannot help but feel that win or lose, the fate of the Russian Jews, promises or no promises, will be the same unless they obtain protection through the influence of other powers. We do not deem it probable, yet recognize that it may be possible, that the heroism of the Russian soldiers, the terrible suffering of the Jews in Russian Poland, the sacrifices they have brought for the country which has not protected but tortured them, may soften the Russian heart. We hope and pray that such possibility may turn into a certainty and that Russia may accord to its unfortunate Jewish subjects human rights protected by law. Mere promises, however, even if made, will not do. Something more than that is necessary. We in this country also are too well aware of the distance between promise and fulfillment as applied to Russian promises in the past. We shall not become pro Russian on promises. When she shall have actually ceased to persecute or to permit to be persecuted her Jewish subjects and shall permit them to live under humane laws applied without discrimination, Russia shall then have better reason to turn to us and to the world for that approbation which she has as yet done nothing to deserve.

BLOW YOUR HORN.

In the Jewish Weekly of New York, of Feb. 5th, appears an article, "Where Does Zionism Stand Today," written by one Louis Lipsky, who describes himself as "chairman of the Executive Committee of the Federation of American Zionists." He says: "Zionism is the only Jewish organization operating internationally. We have been maintaining through the past few months the only medium that speaks for the unity of Israel. In every country we have Jews speaking as citizens of the lands where they reside. Only the Zionists have been able in the midst of the overwhelming misfortune of the Jewish people to speak clearly and indubitably for the specific Jewish interests."

Modesty is evidently not one of Mr. Lipsky's virtues. In a contest of those who continually blow their own horns, he is entitled to first prize. Let all those who believe that Mr. Louis Lipsky, chairman of the Exective Committee, etc., etc., knows what he is talking about, stand up and be counted.

ALBERT SALZENSTEIN.

Albert Salzenstein of Springfield, Ill., Past President of District Grand Lodge No. 6, after an heroic struggle for life, died January 21, 1915. His life was so pure, his character so manly, his attainments so rare, that our loss would be irretrievable were we not to draw the inspiration that such a life offers. He was ever meek and lowly, he was a stranger to arrogance and show, he was ever just and charitable and with the strength of a giant fought injustice and wrong. He was deliberate and cautious in his counsel and ever staid the hand that would wrong a fellow man. He was a lawyer by profession and rose to pre-eminence, though from early manhood handicapped by frailty of body. He was a devout Jew. The interest and love that he had for his people was intense and the cause of Jewry was his cause. Throughout life he seemed to teach those with whom he came in contact the true nobility of the Jew. No man could know him without being impressed with the thought that such men are a rare blessing. His life throughout was a defiant and convincing answer to every calumny against the Jew.

It may be said of him, as was said by Lessing of Mendelssohn.

"What a Jew; yet one who chooses to be thought a Jew, and nothing better."

His body rests in peace, near that kindred in spirit of lowliness and truth, Abraham Lincoln. He was indeed worthy to ascend unto the "Hill of the Lord."

M. NARCISSE LEVEN.

M. Narcisse Leven, the noted philanthropist, died in Paris on Jan. 6, 1915. M. Leven, who was a lawyer by profession, was born in Germany and educated in Paris. For five years he acted as secretary to Adolph Cremieux, the famous French Jewish statesman, and during the Franco-German war he was general secretary of the Ministry of Justice. Subsequently he became member of the Municipal Council of Paris and of which he also served as vice-president.

For many years M. Leven worked for the improvement of the condition of the Jews throughout the world. He was one of the founders of the Alliance Israelite Universelle, becoming successively its secretary, vice-president and president. He was also the president of the Jewish Colonization Association and for many years a member of the Jewish Consistory of Paris. He was a firm believer in the future of Palestine and was instrumental in inducing Baron Rothschild to start his colonization schemes. In his capacity as president of the Jewish Colonization Association he had bought large tracts of land in Palestine. Among those who have done real tangible work for Palestine M. Narcisse Leven stands in the first rank.

His memory and his achievements for his co-religionists will be cherished.

M. CAMILLE LYON.

A distinguished French Jew passed away in the person of M. Camille Lyon, president of a section of the Council of State. He spent the whole of his public career at the Council of State, passing from one grade to another until he reached the high position which he held at the time of his death. M. Lyon was a grand officer of the Legion of Honor and a vice-president of the Central Jewish Consistory of France.

HENRY SCHLESINGER.

Mr. Henry Schlesinger, for many years active in B'nai B'rith circles, died in Lincoln, Neb. He will be missed in the synagogue and in the Lodge room. Whenever the voice of duty called, Brother Schlesinger was ready to respond. In matters of service to his people and to his community no task was too exacting and no labor too menial for him. Brother Schlesinger was a man of honor, a public spirited citizen, a good Ben B'rith, and a devout Jew.

B'NAI B'RITH HONORED.

Brother L. Verstandig of Bellingham, Wash., President of the local B'nai B'rith Lodge, has been appointed by the Mayor to be Commissioner of Parks. In making the appointment Mayor De Mattos said: "In this case I not only appoint him for his business qualifications, but as the first representative Jew to hold official position in the councils of the city."

Mr. Eduard Gold of South Vancouver, B. C., a member of Samuel Lodge of that city, was elected Mayor of South Vancouver.

The B'nai B'rith News congratulates them upon their preferment and feels satisfied that both will serve the public to the best of their ability and that they will be a credit to our people.

THE JEWISH PROBLEM IN ROUMANIA.

The Jewish Chronicle of London reports an interview which a leading coreligionist of Roumania recently had with a liberal member of the Chamber of Deputies, wherein the latter stated that at the very moment the Roumanian Government orders mobilization, the Jewish soldiers will be naturalized by a law "ad hoc." It was further reported that Mr. Bratiano, prime minister of Roumania, has decided to take in hand the solution of the Jewish problem so that it may not be brought up for discussion at the meeting of the Congress which will follow the cessation of the present war.

The foregoing statements have created a sensation among the Jewish population, who imagine that the hour of their emancipation is near.

A CORRECTION.

In the November issue of the News we reported that the sum of 2,000 kroner was sent to Danmark Lodge No. 712 of Copenhagen in aid of Russian refugees.

We wish to correct this statement to the effect that it was not the Lodge, but the Jewish community, of which Rabbi Dr. Max Schornstein is the head, that received this amount and that the sum was paid by him direct to the board of directors of the Jewish community.

HEARING BEFORE THE PRESIDENT ON THE IMMIGRATION BILL.

President Wilson granted a public hearing both to the advocates and opponents of the literacy clause in the immigration bill. The hearing lasted for two and a half hours and was held on the morning of January 22, 1915. The Farmers' National Congress, the Farmers' National Union, through their representative Mr. J. H. Patten, Prof. Fairchild of the Yale University, Prof. Ross of the University of Wisconsin, advocated the desirability of further restriction against immigration. Prof. Learned of the University of Pennsylvania; Representative Gallivan of Boston; Mr. Louis Marshall, President of the American Jewish Committee; Mr. Herman Asher of New York, First Vice-President of District Grand Lodge No. 1; and many others representing various organizations opposed the bill.

The B'nai B'rith was represented by a delegation consisting of Mr. Herman Asher of New York; Mr. Harold B. Chase of Washington; and Mr. Julius I. Peyser of Washington, Past President of District Grand Lodge No. 5.

RELIEF WORK FOR WAR SUFFERERS.

We publish herewith extract from report received from the Grand Lodge of Austria regarding disposition and use of funds sent by the B'nai B'rith for the relief of the war sufferers.

"Considering that the war has been in existence for about five months, the life in Vienna is relatively not as bad as some would have thought it would be. Only the refugees coming from Galicia need larger sums and much work to enable them to maintain themselves. Galicia itself, or that portion which has been occupied by the Russian army has become a desert, particularly the lowlands. In Bohemia, Moravia and Silesia, hundreds of thousands of refugees are to be found, and the lodges of the Order are doing the best to relieve their situation. A larger part of the contribution of the American B'nai B'rith was turned over to the lodges of those countries for the relief of the refugees. In Vienna nothing has as yet been used of the money, as we believe that with the means furnished by our members and the lodges we will be able to make both ends meet."

Editor B'nai B'rith News,
Chicago, Ill.

Dear Sir: I have read in the B. B. News for January with no ordinary interest the letter addressed by the Honorable John Gibbons to the Governor of Georgia in behalf of the unhappy Leo. M. Frank. Had such a strong appeal been made by any other non-Jew I would have wondered at that magnanimity. But different it is with Judge Gibbons. I know him for about forty years. I knew him when he, a struggling young lawyer in Keokuk, Iowa, stood up manfully before the legislature in Des Moines, of which he was a member, arguing against the division of the school funds, although his own church was primarily interested in that issue. He fought valiantly and succeeded. I remember when he defended in court poor people whom he considered innocent of any charge, and his fees were not even thanks. When the Irish land-league flourished I heard him many times holding up the Jewish law as a model of tenementary and blessing, as may also be found in his "Tenure and Toil," published over thirty years ago. It is a blessing that such men live in this country, and Chicago may be proud of Dr. John Gibbons.

My testimony to Judge Gibbons' fine character is not needed, but I feel it a duty to express my personal regard for a man who deserves to be known to every member of the great B. B. order. I beg to subscribe, dear Mr. Editor,

Yours most sincerely,
Rabbi Jos. Bogen, LL. D.

DISTRIBUTION OF WAR FUNDS ABROAD.

We quote from the American Israelite of Jan. 7th as follows:

"A committee has arranged to collect and forward. The funds are to be distributed by the most prominent Jews of Europe and America. Such agencies as Baron Ginsburg in Petrograd and the Rothschilds in France, together with their Vienna connections, as well as the Hilfsverein in Germany, will co-operate with the continental Lodges of the B'nai B'rith in the distribution and are a guarantee of conscientious administration of the funds."

THE ANNUAL MEETING OF THE NATIONAL JEWISH HOSPITAL FOR CONSUMPTIVES.

The annual meeting of the National Jewish Hospital for Consumptives of Denver was held in Chicago, Sunday morning and afternoon, January 17th, at the Congress Hotel. A large gathering of members from all over the country was in attendance and great enthusiasm was manifest. The Executive Committee Meeting was held in the morning, at which a detailed analysis of the work of the hospital was laid before the committee and thoroughly discussed.

At the afternoon session reports were read from the various officers and standing committees. President Samuel Grabfelder read his annual message which gave a general survey of the work of the hospital.

Rev. Dr. William S. Friedman, Chairman of the Board of Managers, gave a summary of the activities of the institution during the past year. He described the new Grabfelder Medical building which was dedicated in Denver on January 10th as the most perfect and completely equipped structure for the treatment of tuberculosis in America. He also stated that the National Jewish Hospital for Consumptives carried on the most thorough methods for the care of tubercular people. Not only was there medical supervision by trained experts within the hospital but follow-up work for the discharged patients. This hospital was the first institution in this country to recognize the necessity of the after-care of ex-patients. The visiting nurses' work and that of the externe physicians together with that of the National relief and employment agents was highly commended.

The reports of the Treasurer, Mr. Ben Altheimer of St. Louis, and Chairman of the Finance Committee, Mr. David S. Lehman of Denver, and of the Secretary, Mrs. S. Pisko of Denver, were read.

The officers elected for the coming year are President, Samuel Grabfelder of Philadelphia; Vice-Presidents, J. Walter Freiberg of Cincinnati, David S. Lehman of Denver, Rev. Dr. William S. Friedman of Denver, Hermon August of New York City; Treasurer, Mr. Ben Altheimer of St. Louis; Secretary, Mrs. S. Pisko of Denver; Executive Committee, Samuel Grabfelder; J. Walter Freiberg, David S. Lehman, William S. Friedman, Hermon August, Sol. S. Kiser, Benjamin Altheimer, Adolf Kraus, Louis D. Shoenberg, Dr. J. Leonard Levy, Martin A. Marks.

The meeting was addressed by Messrs. Adolf Kraus, Judge Julian W. Mack, Martin A. Marks, Rev. Dr. J. Leonard Levy, Dr. Theo. Sachs, Dr. M. Biesenthal, J. Walter Freiberg and Mr. Chas. Friend and Mrs. Hannah G. Soloman.

The Committee of Arrangements entertained the Executive Committee at a luncheon at the Congress Hotel.

Resolutions of thanks were extended to the Local Committee who so ably arranged the meetings. A resolution of sympathy was sent to the 2nd Vice-President, Mr. David S. Lehman of Denver, who was absent from the meeting on account of illness.

B'NAI B'RITH GATHERS $91,000 FOR JEWISH WAR SUFFERERS.

The Money Has Been Sent to Austria, Germany, Russia, Denmark, Servia and Palestine—Collections Still Going On.

The Independent Order B'nai B'rith which has its headquarters in Chicago has done important work for the war sufferers. Up to this time the B'nai B'rith has collected $91,000 and the collections are still going on. The funds have been sent to the different countries now engaged in war, and were distributed to the Jews who are mostly in need of help.

The Jewish Daily News was interested to know what so important an organization like the B'nai B'rith is doing for the war sufferers, and a telegram was sent to the Secretary, Mr. A. B. Seelenfreund for information. The reply was a very satisfactory one, and it is to the effect that "the collections are still going on. To date $91,000 were received in our office, which amount was distributed to the following countries:

70,000 Marks to Germany,
110,000 Kronen to Austria,
2,000 Kronen to Denmark,
10,000 Francs to Servia,
20,000 Roubles to Russia,
2,000 Dollars to London, and
50,000 Francs to Palestine. The balance will shortly be dispersed wherever help is needed.—Translation of an article in the Jewish Daily News, January 28, 1915.

THE LOGIC OF INSTINCT

By Dr. MAX L. MARGOLIS
Written for the B'nai B'rith News.

It was an act of mercy, declares a teacher in the Talmud, that Israel was dispersed; for, said he in conversation with a heretic, if the Jews were to be exterminated in one country, there would still be Jews elsewhere in the world. In other words, if dispersed we must be, it is well that the dispersion shall spread over many lands. I wonder whether the good rabbi contemplated a catastrophe like the one being enacted now in the eastern theater of the war. Poland and Galicia are far away, distant to our reach, distant to our mental horizon. The American people is honestly struggling to pronounce all those names with consonants heaped upon consonants. There, in the far East, is penned up the bulk of Jewry. The masses that have always lived from hand to mouth are turned into paupers begging that body and soul may be kept together. The flower of the Jewish youth is dying on the battlefields, shedding their blood, as is the case in Russian Poland, for a stepmotherly country. Between the Russians who distrust them and the Poles who boycott them, they are between the devil and the deep sea. The Jewish question bids fair to be solved in Europe. There will not be any Jews after the war to trouble about. Such is the mercy of dispersion.

The truth is that, far from dispersing themselves, the Jews throughout their history have concentrated in large masses in certain areas and within them in the large cities. Forty years ago Warsaw harbored the largest Jewish community of the world. Today it is New York. At one time the largest aggregate of Jews was to be found in the valley between the two rivers that empty themselves into the Persian Gulf. After a while the center shifted to Egypt and Alexandria boasted of a Jewish population equalling that in New York today. Then again the center shifted to Babylonia, and thence to Spain, and thence to the Rhenish provinces and thence to Poland, and thence to America.

Concentration has been the rule. But concentration proved a thorn in the flesh of the illiberal neighbor or "host," as he calls himself. And so the camps were broken up and the tents of Jacob were pitched in a new spot until hatred again led to a new exodus. Concentration is dictated by the instinct of the Jew for self-preservation and concentration is turned into a snare through the instinct of the dominant race clamoring for the alien's absorption. Were the Jew so to disperse himself that each city and hamlet would have that percentage of Jews corresponding to the percentage of the Jewish population in the whole land, he would slowly but surely be lost. The Jew is apparently unwilling to lose himself. So he concentrates. And the world is unwilling to put up with Jewish concentration. So the center must perforce be shifted.

Up to the close of the eighteenth century Palestine constituted the hope of the wandering Jew. Thrice daily the Jew prayed that Jerusalem might be rebuilt and the dispersed gathered. He wailed for the destruction of the holy city; her fate was ever before his eyes; on his high-days of joy he remembered Zion lonely and forsaken. The Jewish heart was in the East, though his feet stood on Western soil. In the middle ages no difficulty resulted from the Jew's mental expatriation. The European states were then just beginning to be nationalized, and the process is not yet completed. It was in the eighteenth century, in the years immediately preceding the emancipation, that the Jew realized the problem of dual citizenship or dual patriotism. Now individuals and certain segments of Jewry have solved the problem quite neatly, but it cannot be said that a solution has been found acceptable to the entire Jewish people.

The question turned about the Messiah the future king of the Jews, who was to gather the dispersed and establish them as a nation in Palestine. Maimonides it was who had divested the Messianic person of all other worldly accessories and miracles and made of him a purely political dynast. The masses, it is true, had persisted in their hazy notions concerning that personality, but even with them the political side was never wholly lost sight of. And so when in the eighteenth century an attempt was made to give up the belief in a Messianic person as inconsistent with citizenship, the orthodox [illegible] felt that the dualism was only ideal, that the Messiah and redemption would come in God's own time, perchance tomorrow, but probably a long time off, in the millennium, that in the meantime they might heed Jeremiah's advice to pray for the welfare of the city in which they dwelt and behave as if they were to abide for all time in the lands of which they were citizens. Orthodoxy with its Messianic redeemer in the millennium and Reform with its impersonal Messianic era of peace and good-will equally placed in the millennium, both seemed to have found a logical solution. Logic there was, the logic of the conditions as they then for the first time presented themselves.

A newer cleavage occurred in the nineteenth century. We of the latter days seem to be transported to the times which witnessed the rise of the great parties in the Syrian dominion. We have our Hellenists who believe in surrendering Jewish separateness except in matters purely theological; we have the Pharisees, who, like Daniel of old, wait for the Messiah from the clouds, and who would not stir a finger until God by His own hand wrought the miracle; and we have the Sadducees who believe that the secular concerns of the Jewish people are paramount, religion being a part and not the whole of the Jewish life. Hence there are those who are of the opinion that the return can be organized by human agencies. And those among them who have not lost contact with the Judaism of the past point out that God does not work mechanically, catastrophically, but through human agencies and that He it is who inspires the counsel of the leaders. These Jews grant the plea of the Liberals that much in Judaism stands in need of reform; but they would leave it to natural evolution. Above all they boast that the logic of instinct is on their side. The sub-conscious is stronger than the conscious, for the sub-conscious means in the individual the stored-up thinking of the race.

Whether we are impelled by the logic of instinct or the logic of conditions, let us be tolerant of each other. Let those who make much of conditions sound the depths of their instincts, and let those who heed the sub-conscious impulses remember that conditions are also God-made. At present we are all in the dispersion. We shall probably continue for some time to have several concentration areas. Perhaps that one of these will in the end do justice to conditions and instinct alike.

NEWS FROM LONDON

BY OUR CORRESPONDENT DR. M. EPSTEIN

London, January 21, 1915.

There is a well-known story of a Jew who having no work undertook to be a lion in a show. It was his duty to go into the lions' cage where he would be exhibited as one of a set of two. A bargain's a bargain, and in he went. He found the other lion already there, and his heart trembled within him. Suddenly the newcomer heard his companion roar, and beside himself, cried out "Shema Yisroel!" What was his surprise when the other lion calmed him with the words, "Don't be frightened; I, too, am a Jew!"

* * * * *

No doubt everybody has heard the story; it shows Jewish ubiquitousness. But we are able to cap this jolly yarn by another that is tragic. Imagine a battle-front. The din of war is raging. There is a hand-to-hand fight. A man rushes on his adversary with his bayonet fixed, ready to send him to death. His opponent in the very face of death utters the cry, "Shema Yisroel." It is his last word. But it has so affrighted the other that he has gone raving mad on the spot. For he, too, was a Jew, and he has killed his fellow Jew. The survivor in the story is at present in Frankfort, and we have it on the best evidence that his affliction is so great that the hope of his ever recovering is but slender. It is just one aspect of the tragedy of war. It is also the tragedy of the Jew! You meet it at every step. The Germans in Russia take what they can from the Jewish inhabitants who are of course, very numerous in those parts. No less numerous are the Jews in Galicia, and the Russians' hand is heavy upon them. So the Jew is driven from pillar to post. No wonder he is a pacifist. He has felt the horrors of war longest.

* * * * *

It is good to turn from this black misery to lighter scenes. In Brussels, an English newspaper correspondent relates, Rabbi Bloch insists on reading the prayer for King Albert, whereas the German authorities would have him pray for the Kaiser. The result is that in one and the same synagogue on Saturday morning the Brussels Jewish community prays as it has been accustomed, and then the Jewish German soldiers take part in a second service when they pray for the Kaiser.

* * * * *

What will it all end in? The general aspect of the question concerns all men; for us the Jewish aspect is vital. In England public opinion is fully alive to the importance of being ready when the time comes for settlement. Public opinion here realizes the two distinct sides of what is called for short the Jewish Question. First, there is the full emancipation of Jews the world over. It is so elementary a demand, so much apt to be taken for granted, that to dwell on it at length is a real necessity. When the settlement comes, no matter who is victorious, Jews should ask for their complete political freedom everywhere. We are aware, of course, that the Treaty of Berlin in 1878 did not overlook Jewish rights and that the treaty was futile so far as these were concerned. Nevertheless, we believe in making the demand anew. The world is some 30 years older since then. Some tell us that democracy, at least in free countries, will make its voice heard at the peace settlement. We sincerely hope so. For if democracy and democratic organization do have a word in the rearrangements, surely a plea for equal civil liberties will obtain their support. What is needed therefore, is a clear and not too lengthy statement of Jewish disabilities wherever they exist; which means, not only Russia and Roumania, but other countries too. Surely human rights and liberties will not be denied those who lack them. In any case every Jew should hold himself in readiness to plead the cause of elementary liberty—not for Jews only but for all those who lack it. Be it Poles or Ruthenians, negroes or Chinese, let the world ring out with the claim for liberty. Jews do not want special consideration or favored treatment.

* * * * *

In some quarters it is suggested that that is precisely what will be offered to them. It is asserted that no matter what the end of the war may be, there are soon to be changes in Palestine. Palestine then, is the second question for the Jew. The German government is said to have pointed out that since Turkey is now Germany's ally, the future of Palestine will be determined by Germany's word, and she is prepared to put in a good word for the Jews. Very nice, if Germany wins. But what if she is defeated? In that eventuality a good many people in this country believe that Palestine would come under British influence and in all probability would form the center of a Jewish settlement. In either event, Palestine looks promising.

* * * * *

But (and this is the danger) it has been suggested that Palestine may be made a Jewish settlement (no one is so foolish as to talk of an independent State) by a kind of bargain. It is put in this way. The Powers (meaning, of course, Russia chiefly) will agree to a Jewish Palestine, but that will absolve them from any further action in favor of the Jews in their own borders. We must hasten to add that all this is mere vague rumor. But it is as well not to overlook it. Whereas there are in reality two independent parts of the Jewish problem—Palestine on the one hand and complete political emancipation on the other—attempts may be made to fuse them. All thinking Jews must be made to see the vital importance of keeping the two separate and apart. That this will be difficult we do not deny. But a good many people in this country feel the gravity of the situation. For it must not be imagined that all Jews are going to Palestine. In the first place, all Jews are not desirous of leaving their present habitations. In the second place Palestine could not maintain all the Jews. Hence while a fair number of Jews may settle in the land of their fathers, by far the greater proportion of the total will continue to live in the Diaspora, citizens of many lands. These must be guaranteed the elementary rights of citizenship.

* * * * *

All these points call for careful thought. Some centralized committee must take the business in hand. Now Jews in England are in this position. In days gone by—in the eighteenth century—when Jewish emancipation was not as yet in existence, the Board of Deputies of British Jews acted as the mouthpiece of Jewry to the British Government. One can easily understand that much beneficent work must have been accomplished by the board. But when Jewish emancipation came about there was not much for the Board of Deputies to do. Anyhow, it was vicious to continue the body; it always gave the impression of asking for special treatment. But be that as it may, in the process of time another organization—the Anglo-Jewish Association—managed to get leading Jews interested in itself, and truth to tell, did fine work, chiefly in providing education for Jews in the Orient. Now it came about that the Anglo-Jewish Association had occasion to make representations to the foreign office concerning the treatment of Jews in distant lands or about its affairs generally in foreign parts. Of these representations to the foreign office the Board of Deputies was very jealous. Being the older body it considered that to go to the government should be its own exclusive privilege. To cut a long story short, the Board of Deputies and the Anglo-Jewish Association agreed to a compromise, setting up what has been loosely called a "conjoint committee," with equal representation of each, and this committee was the channel of intercourse between Jewry and the foreign or any other government office.

* * * * *

In normal times it did not much matter how the government was approached; the questions were generally of more or less local interest, and the "conjoint committee" was very secretive in its methods, and very fatherly in its relations to the community. It was tolerated, although no one seemed to know quite who were its members. It was tolerated because no one much cared. But, in the present crisis, everybody cares. The "conjoint committee" tacitly assumes that if any case for the Jews is to be taken to the foreign office it shall be of their making and shall be delivered through their agency. But the public wants to know first what its views are. Everyone among us in Anglo-Jewry is anxious to maintain a united front: everyone is willing to allow the work to be done by the "conjoint committee," if only the committee will come out into the open and, as befits a democratic age, say clearly what its views are. If they win public support, why there's an end of it. They have then established their position. If they do not, steps might be taken, amicable steps, to try and win them over. But their present attitude is most unreasonable. They wish to work behind closed doors. If they undertake to speak for Jewry or Anglo-Jewry they must get their mandate. That is all that the public and the press ask for But the gentlemen seem to hold ancient and injurious seigniorial opinions. Moreover, many folk here are dissatisfied with the make-up of the "conjoint committee." Before it mattered little: now it matters very much.

We have gone into all these details in order to make clear to the brethren in America that at the present juncture this problem of the composition and the programme of the "conjoint committee" is attracting a good deal of attention and may be said to be the center of gravity of Jewish public life Of course, our congregational life, such as it is, is as active as ever; we are even going to build the Chief Rabbi an office and a partial residence at a cost of (say) forty thousand dollars. We are doing our duty to the Belgian and other refugees in our midst. We are training in the country's army, thousands of us, ready to serve the country's cause. But the center of interest is this "conjoint committee" business. Reasonable men are patient, waiting and hoping for the "conjoint committee" to come out from its cave and take the public into its confidence. Pessimists give up all hope and want to force the hands of the "conjoint committee." This they have already commenced to do. It is important to understand that the heart of the matter is a desire for unity.

Anyhow, the first lodge of England spoke with one voice in selecting its officers for the present year. The reccommendations of the council were approved, and our new president is Brother Simon Rosenbaum, who will find the unanimous support of the Lodge in his leading. In many respects his year of office will be noteworthy, and the work before him will not be easy. But we are confident that he will rise to the occasion, and that he will be wholeheartedly supported by his colleagues goes without saying. The present writer is the vice-president. For treasurer we have Brother Frederick S. Spiers, "persona gratissima" with all who know him (and who do not?). But the lodge has been most fortunate (we believe the other officers will agree in this opinion) in inducing Brother Benjamin to continue to be honorary general secretary for a second year. How much depends on a secretary in a society like ours everybody knows. In the lodge everybody knows that Brother Benjamin has delightful and excellent qualities of heart and head, combined with first rate business ability. The lodge owes him a very great debt of gratitude. He has been a tower of strength to us. His assistant in the foreign department is Brother Daiches, who filled the post to perfection last year, too. Brother Maurice Myers is guardian; what he has done by personal service for the hostel of the lodge for Belgian refugees has been great. The warden is Brother Isaac Landau, "the friend of the immigrant," and Brother Augustus Kahn, last year's splendid president, is this year's monitor. Brothers Gaster, Gelberg, J. Snowman and S. Wallach are the councillors, and again we have succeeded in getting brethren who have done yeomen service to the lodge together with those who are about to do it. With an executive such as this the lodge may look forward to a good year's work; and we believe that an increase in membership will be one of the things to be aimed at.

* * * * *

We must not leave unmentioned two lodge "events" which though of a private character are yet a source of pleasure to all the brethren. Our Past President, Dr. M. Gaster, not only married his eldest daughter this month, but himself celebrated the silver jubilee of his own marriage. A week or two before that our last year's Treasurer, Brother Rubenstein, became engaged to Miss Hirschfeld, who by virtue of her father's membership of the lodge may justly claim to be a B'nai B'rith. We are sure that in wishing the young couple great joy on their journey through life and the old couple as great honor as they have hitherto had, we shall be voicing the feelings of every brother of the First Lodge of England in London.

Thoughts and Tidings--A Review of Passing Events

By H. Eliassof

Nationalism.

In recent years the world has learned much about nationalism. Historians, critics, economists and politicians have written enough about it in books and periodicals and the subject has frequently been dicussed in literary circles. Among the Jewish People too the question of nationalism has lately been coming to the front. Within the last few decades a Jewish national party has been formed which is striving to revive among the Jews their old hopes for the restoration of their national independence, a hope which has accompanied the Jewish people through many centuries of the diaspora, but has lately been dimmed by the emancipation granted to the Jews in the enlightened countries of Europe and almost totally extinguished by the full liberty which many thousands of Jews enjoy in this country under the protection of the stars and stripes. The new Jewish national movement is called "Zionism" after Zion, a mountain in Jerusalem. The name stands also for Palestine, which is the country where the Jewish nationalists hope to re-establish the Jewish nation and where they expect to have a nationalism of their own.

The idea of Zionism, as far as it aims to give a home to the thousands of unfortunate Jews, who have no country and no home, because they live among semi-civilized nations, who look upon them as aliens, who are not entitled to share with them in their particular nationalism, and, therefore, deprive them of all human rights is certainly a good one. Also the striving of Zionism to bring back these Jews to the agricultural pursuit of ancient Israel and to establish a center for Jewish culture in the land of our fathers, where our immortal prophets lived and delivered their inspired and inspiring messages to the world, where our illustrious teachers taught their wise and incomparable lessons of right-living, and where the sweet singer in Israel sang his royal psalms, is indeed very praiseworthy ,and deserving of enthusiastic and devoted support. But it seems to me that the endeavor of the Zionists to bring a fervent nationalism into the life of the Jew of the twentieth century is not at all prudent or desirable. It is against peace and progress and against all the best Jewish interests. The intense nationalism of the different nations is mostly responsible for the unceasing sufferings of millions of Jews. Those very nations, who in their fervent nationalism kept the Jew for centuries on the outskirts of the rights of citizenship, now find themselves plunged by their nationalistic policy of government into the yawning abyss of a cruel war in which they are wasting their richest resources and are destroying the best elements of their populations. Nationalism has encompassed many a strong and vigorous nation with disaster and ruination and nationalism can surely bring no better results to a Jewish nation. In most instances nationalism means nothing else than the consciousness of power which one group of individuals, who are combined by birth or naturalization, uses in order to separate itself from other groups. Under the present political system of the world, power is the only medium by which national independence can be safeguarded. Can the Jews hope to gain enough power to attain and to maintain the necessary means to assure the permanent life of their independent state? It certainly does not seem so. Even if the newly established Jewish nation should live under the suzerainty of one of the great powers, it still would have to face many dangers. For instance, the Jewish culture has always been a living protest against the cultures which prevail among the other nations of the world. The Jew continued to exist in the world in spite of the most terrible persecutions for the very reason that he remained faithful to his protesting culture, and in order to remain Jewish this culture must forever continue to protest against the other cultures. It cannot yield or make an offer to compromise. How then will a weak Jewish nation living under the suzerainty of a powerful state resist the pressure from without? How can this Jewish nation hope to escape for long a clash of interests which must come about by the impressions of the foreign culture which will be created by the influence of the greater power of the outside authority?

The present European war teaches humanity the humiliating lesson that in spite of the passing of the dark ages and the steady progress of the later centuries, man has not yet learned to extricate his life from the influences of the uncultured past. He has not only not yet learned to abolish war, which surely does not fit into the civilization of modern times, but in his present wars he still displays the same traits and tactics which his savage ancestors displayed thousands of years ago when they still roamed through the forests in a state of nakedness. In Paris the French populace stands gaping before a wagon load of war trophies consisting of caps and casques, bayonets and belts captured from the German enemy. In Berlin and Vienna, in London and Petrograd the same thing repeats itself only with the change of the name of the enemy. They all show as much joy and exaltation in the display of such trophies of victory as the savage Indian displayed when he exhibited the scalp locks which he had cut off from the heads of the enemies of his tribe. All that the combatants of today are not doing is the taking of the scalp locks of their enemies. But the atrocities of which the nations now at war are accusing each other of committing are fully as cruel and inhuman as the taking of a scalp lock. While each accused nation vehemently denies all the charges of the adversary, many of the accusations seem to be supported by strong evidence. And we must not forget that this is a time of war when the passions are inflamed, the souls of the fighting men are dipped in hate and their hearts are hungry and thirsty for revenge and blood. War is always cruel, atrocious and beastly. It never stops to reckon with civilization, religion or morality and the cruelties of war are not much different today than they were when the hordes of Huns hurled themselves against the Goths or when the Saracens subdued a great part of Asia, Africa and Europe.

The whole idea of nationalism which has recently gained such a mighty influence in Europe, which political demagogues are now trying very hard to introduce in the United States by agitating for militarism, and which the Jewish nationalists are longing to create for the Jews in Palestine, is nothing but a remnant of the old tribal idea of the semi-civilized peoples of ancient times. It is a relic of the dead past. Modern nationalism has all the earmarks of ancient tribalism and one is as narrow and as pernicious as the other. Ancient tribalism was rooted in the egotism, arrogance and self-aggrandisement of one group of individuals who used their combined power to keep themselves separated from other groups. Modern nationalism is precisely the same thing. Ancient tribalism nourished and nurtured the spirit of antagonism, scorn and hatred in the heart of one tribe against the other, which often culminated in bloody wars. Modern nationalism does exactly the same thing. Under the influence of the old tribal spirit war became an honored profession in the life of the tribes, militarism developed and war lords dominated, and under the influence of the spirit of modern nationalism we also find war invested with honor and glory, the soldier class towering above the rest of the people, militarism sapping the strength of the life of the commonwealth and war lords leading in ways of destruction. The narrow conception of tribalism was undoubtedly a stumbling block in the way of progress and an unsurmountable barrier to the development of universal liberty, of a united humanity and of better conditions of life. Modern nationalism is just as much of a hindrance to the realization of all the hopes and promises of civilization, and it retards just as much the progress of the human race. As long as nationalism exists there can be no escape from war, and war is the bitterest enemy of all the best impulses of man.

The present moment is perhaps not the right one to undertake to establish the real reason for this world war. While the war trumpets sound their shrill alarms, steel clashes upon steel and the air is filled with the moans and groans of the wounded and dying thousands, the minds of men, even those who are far away from the war zone, are not in a position to judge calmly and clearly. Truth is liable to be obscured by the smoke from the mouths of the cannons. But the time will come when this war will cease, when peace will reign again and silence will settle upon the battlefields of today, the flames of passion will burn themselves out, sense will take the place of sensationalism, and truth will prevail instead of hypocrisy. Then calm and impartial minds will search and find the real causes of this devastating conflagration. History will tell the untarnished truth and render its stern judgment, and I venture to predict that the verdict of this tribunal of the world against nationalism will fill many pages. It will tell the world the tale of the treachery of nationalism, the greatest evil of modern times, against our civilization and I imagine that the story will read about as follows:

The two youngest children of Father Time, the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, brought many sweet dreams and golden hopes of the salvation of humanity and the redemption of the world. During the last half of the nineteenth century Alexander II, the Czar of Russia, liberated 23,000,000 of white serfs and about the same time the immortal emancipator, Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States, struck off the shackles from the limbs of more than 3,000,000 of black slaves, and these glorious achievements of liberty filled the soul of man with joy and happiness and encouraged the world to look for greater blessings and still greater promises of peace and progress. During all this time nationalism wove its dark, diabolical intrigues against the civilization of the world. It caused many dissensions and wars among the nations, but it did not succeed in impeding the onward march of humanity. The world continued to progress on the paths of light and liberty and the nineteenth century departed leaving behind a trail of new ideas and a new conception of life. The twentieth century entered the gates of the mundane sphere in a blaze of glory. It carried aloft the flaming torch of a bright future and proclaimed the message of the coming of greater days for humanity. Suddenly nationalism, the demon of darkness, sounded the trumpet of hate and aided by militarism, its most powerful assistant, it precipitated a world war and dealt the death blow to civilization. The tramp of huge marching armies, the battle cries of many nations, the deafening beats of myriads of war drums and the triumphant slogans of death completely drowned all the sweet music of the exultant songs of the brotherhood of man, of universal liberty and universal peace which the young century has intoned. The heavy hand of nationalism ruthlessly broke the harp of human happiness and wantonly hushed the voice of the world's joy!

As proof that I am not exaggerating in my denunciation of nationalism, I will quote some of the words of Dr. Ernst Richard, Lecturer on the History of German Civilization at the Columbia University. In his excellent work, "History of German Civilization," he states: "The power, the force, the idea that resisted civilization is nationalism." Alas, it seems that when the Creator of the universe uttered his beneficent decree: "Let there be light!" He did not destroy darkness. Every ray of light casts a shadow and every beam of sunshine is threatened with extinction by a dismal cloud of darkness. Ahurmazda and Ahriman, the spirits of light and darkness, the forces of good and evil, are forever struggling for supremacy and each one is strenuously striving to vanquish the other. To man's sorrow darkness is too often victorious over light and evil too frequently triumphs over good.

Internationalism.

The antidote of the poison of nationalism is internationalism. According to Dr. Richard, two forces were created by the progress and development of the European states, nationalism and internationalism. Nationalism separated and internationalism united the nations. It is a pity that the friends of peace did not long ago concentrate all their forces in the one endeavor to spread and to strengthen the idea of internationalism among the nations, to counteract the influence of nationalism. And it is a greater pity that men whom heaven had endowed with the gift of genius, who were kissed by the muses and whose word had a deep influence in the world, such great men as Herder, Klopstock and Wieland, have helped to strengthen the national feeling. Even Moses Mendelssohn, the philosopher, of Berlin, taught the Jews in Germany to become German nationalists. Lessing alone, of all the great German poets, the first truly free man, proclaimed the theory of internationalism, in his lessons of true toleration. As a rule internationalism prevailed in the republic of letters. The German Goethe influenced English literature as much as the English Shakespeare has helped to develop German literature and the French Voltaire benefited by both and wielded manifestly some influence on both.

The ascendancy of internationalism did more for the emancipation of the Jews than all the nationalistic movements. If the Jewish nationalists could devise a plan by which the new Jewish state which they are eager to create could at its very start enter into a general international agreement with all the other states, then the newly created Jewish state would have some chance of endurable existence. But not if nationalism is their only party shibboleth and remains the only inspiration of their movement. The independent Jewish political state would derive as much benefit from an international policy of government as the Jewish cultural center would gain from the internationalism of literature by the mutual literary interaction. The progressive spirit of humanity needs the help of the promoting influence of internationalism and not of the hindering and retrogressive force of nationalism. The salvation of the Jew rests in progress and not in retrogression.

JEWS AND THE WAR.

Of utmost importance to the world, as well as to the Jews, is it that when the time for peace negotiations come, there should be a settlement of the Jewish problem. Such a settlement must involve securing for them equal human rights with others in each of the countries which now discriminate against Jews either by their laws or by administrative practices.

Among other things, this involves a removal of the disabilities under which the Jews labor in Russia, in Roumania, in Persia, and in certain respects in Palestine.

The importance of removing the disabilities in Russia and in Roumania have been so much discussed publicly that the problem as to those countries is well understood. The importance of the problems as it concerns Palestine is not as well understood.

The Near East must play an important part in the future history of the world. It is to the Near East that we must look for a reconciliation of the contrast and antipathies between the Orient and the Occident. Each needs an interpreter to the other, and civilization demands that the world should have the benefit of the good that each can contribute. If the world is to live at peace and is to advance undisturbed, a better mutual understanding between East and West is essential. The Jew is a natural interpreter of the West to the East and of the East to the West. He can understand the Musselman and the Musselman can understand him.

Increased settlement of Jews in Palestine, the establishment for them there of the publicly recognized, legally secured home for which the Zionists are working, would therefore not only satisfy the longing of a large number of Jews the world over but it would serve as a bridge between the Musselman East and our Western civilization.

The Ottoman Empire also needs what a Jewish settlement in Palestine can give —economic development through an industrious and able people educated in the best that modern science can afford and desirous of becoming permanent citizens of the Empire. From such economic development the Western world would gain, as well as the Ottoman Empire.

The development which has been made of Palestine through the Zionist inspiration, particularly in the last ten years, has proved that Palestine is fitted for the modern Jew and that the modern Jew is fitted for Palestine. The Jews in reasonable number are sure to go if they can be given reasonable assurance of equal civil and political rights and of the opportunity of developing the country.

In the settlement of the world problems which must follow the war, the relation of the Jews to Palestine is therefore one of truly first-rate importance.—Harper's Weekly.

A CORRECTION.

In the November issue of the News it stated that German Jewry has furnished 6,000 soldiers. The exact number cannot be ascertained. It is positive, however, that at least four times the number mentioned would be more nearly correct. No doubt if every available man in Germany should be called to the colors the number of Jewish warriors would exceed 50,000. So far, however, a large number of available men, and among them many Jews, have not been called.

CHANUKA CELEBRATION BY BORUSSIA LODGE.

At the instigation of Rabbi Dr. Kaelter, Borussia Lodge of Danzig, on the occasion of the Chanuka festival, arranged an entertainment with a distribution of gifts for the Jewish soldiers in garrison or in the hospitals in that city. With the consent of the Royal commander of the city 71 Jewish soldiers assembled to celebrate the anniversary of the Makkabean struggles. There were present soldiers belonging to all the different branches of the services and of all ranks, a large number of them being war volunteers and many who had already served at the front. One of these had obtained the decoration of the Iron Cross. The impressive ceremony of the lighting of the candles was accompanied by a song by Chief Cantor Meisel, and was followed by recitations and chorus singing by the children of the children's home maintained by the Lodge. Dr. Kaelter then delivered the oration. In eloquent language he painted the heroic figures of the Makkabeans as fitting examples for the present times, and urged his hearers to follow in the footsteps of those men, and imitate them in their trust in God, their readiness for sacrifice and immutable confidence in the victory of their just cause. His speech closed with cheers for the Emperor, wherein all present joined enthusiastically. As a veteran of the wars of 1866 and 1870, the oldest member of the Lodge, Mr. J. Levy, a merchant by vocation, then addressed his comrades in arms, admonishing them to do their full duty as their fathers had done before them.

The guests appreciated the artistic program carried out successfully by Mrs. Jacobsohn, Mrs. Jacoby, Mrs. Kraemer and Mr. Koester. Refreshments were provided by the Ladies' Auxiliary of the Borussia Lodge.

SISTERHOOD OF THE BERLIN LODGES.

The Home for Mothers and Children, supported by the Sisterhood of the Berlin Lodges U. O. B. B. (Brunnen Str. No. 41), has been moved since the completion of its new buildings to its new location. Twenty-five mothers and their children can now be taken care of in large well-lighted and ventilated rooms, equipped with all modern hygienic improvements.

The exceptional distress caused by the war, and making itself felt so bitterly in all directions, forced the opening of the new Home at an earlier date than anticipated, in order to meet the demands made upon the Home, and mainly to provide shelter for the women who had to flee from their own homes that had been invaded by the enemy.

The Board decided to forego all ceremonial and official dedication, in view of the existing serious times. The Sisterhood, however, reserves the privilege to invite its friends and patrons, its brothers and sisters of the Berlin Lodges to an inspection of the new Home when this cruel war shall be terminated.

GABRIEL RIESSER LODGE ENTERTAINS SOLDIERS.

The Chanuka celebration arranged by the Gabriel Riesser Lodge of Thorn for the Jewish soldiers of the garrison took place on Sunday, December 20th, and some 150 soldiers were in attendance. The military authorities had furnished in the most courteous manner a list of all the Jews in garrison, so that it was possible to send each one of them a personal invatation. Besides this the attention of the Jewish soldiers had been called to this celebration through a general order issued by the commander. The ladies of the board of directors of the Ladies' Auxiliary are entitled to great credit for having prepared the assembly room of the Congregational meeting house for this occasion by suitable decorations. The services began by an organ recital of the Netherland prayer of thanks. Then Rabbi Dr. Rosenberg addressed the assembly, greeting the guests and bidding them welcome, and drawing a comparison between the heroic Makkabean struggle and the present war. After the singing of the Chanukah hymn refreshments were served. When all were seated at the table, Judiciary Counselor Feilchenfeld arose to propose the health of the Emperor, and all present joined with hearty cheers, and the entire assembly intoned the National hymn. A member of Pommerania Lodge of Stettin, called into military service at Thorn, expressed the thanks of the invited guests in appropriate terms, closing his remarks by proposing three cheers for Gabriel Riesser Lodge. Gabriel Riesser Lodge may be proud of the successful entertainment it has given to these soldiers.

B'NAI B'RITH DAY CELEBRATION BY WAUSAU LODGE, WAUSAU, WIS.—OFFICIAL VISIT BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE DISTRICT, MR. CHAS. L. AARONS OF MILWAUKEE.

Brother Chas. L. Aarons of Milwaukee, President of District Grand Lodge No. 6, paid an official visit to Wausau Lodge No. 670 of Wausau, Wis., on the occasion of its B'nai B'rith Day celebration on Sunday, Jan. 10, 1915.

The program consisted of a meeting of the Lodge in the morning, at which a class of twelve candidates was initiated by the degree team of the Lodge. The new members consist mostly of young men of high quality and no doubt will prove desirable acquisitions to the Lodge.

In the afternoon a public meeting was held, at which about 150 people were present to witness the installation ceremonies conducted by Brother Aarons. Following the installation Mr. S. Winkelman, President of the Lodge, introduced President Aarons as the guest of honor.

"The spirit of the ages with the Jew has been the religious spirit," said Mr. Aarons, after a brief introduction in which he complimented the local Lodge on a custom introduced by them of saluting the American flag at the opening of every meeting. "This spirit has kept alive the spark of Judaism throughout the centuries. This religious spirit developed the strange power of the Israelites in battle, so that when, greatly outnumbered, Jewish armies fought in historic times with the allies of Canaan, the allies were driven back, and their soldiers confounded. Then it was that the defeated king of the Canaanite hosts said, 'The God of Israel is indeed a mighty God, He fights with His people.' And so through the centuries the Jewish people have lived with the consciousness of God living and fighting with them.

"Through all vicissitudes, all of our wanderings from place to place, the spirit of the people has survived against the evil directed against them. Not so much a physical strength as a virility and a spiritual endurance has kept the Jewish nation as it is when more powerful nations fell along the way. Rome, Babylonia, Assyria, are but memories on the pages of history, their empires scattered and their power dethroned."

Racial Integrity Unimpaired.

"The racial integrity of the Jew has been little impaired by all these years of wandering and misfortune," continued the speaker. "He has the same memories and the same traditions that his forefathers held. To the non-Jew, every Jew is alike, with all the traditions of Israel. What is the reason for this racial integrity? Because our ancestors were faithful to the spirit of the forefathers of the race, because they obeyed the fifth commandment, 'Thou shalt honor thy father and thy mother,' in both the letter and the spirit. Not only did they honor them, but they honored and preserved their memories, customs and traditions, and they have been passed down from century to century, generation to generation, till they have reached us.

"There was a time when the power of the Jews was weakening. On the same day that Christopher Columbus sailed for America with the money provided not by the jewels of Queen Isabella, but by Jews, 300,000 Jews were driven from Spain with only such of their possessions as they could carry with them. They went from country to country then, receiving a welcome neither from brother Jew nor Gentile, for the spirit that makes the western and the eastern Jew look askance at each other today was alive then.

Welcome Immigrants.

"We look on those 300,000 exiled Jews as martyrs, as those who have suffered a horrible catastrophe. But every year there are coming thousands of Jews to the shores of the United States, the same kind of men and women as those exiled centuries ago from Spain. America is the one land where the doors have been thrown open for the oppressed of all nations. Shall the Jews of America be less charitable, less generous, than the people of the nation in which we live?"

Mr. Aarons spoke for some time on the work of the Order of B'nai B'rith, dwelling particularly on the practical scope of some of the services of the Lodge. Although the Lodge is an organization of idealists, he stated, probably in no other association is the combination of idealism and materialism so nearly perfect.

He mentioned the work of the Anti-Defamation Society, a branch of the Order, which is preventing objectionable slander, caricature, and libelous advertising of certain kinds.

"But in the end," concluded Mr. Aarons, "we are conserving true Americanism, for we are strengthening the local unit which is the basis of the strength of the nation. The stronger the state, the stronger the city, the stronger will be the nation. But there will be no strength if the final, most important unit is not strong; and that unit is the home."

After the address a program of orchestral music was given. In the evening a banquet was tendered the guest of honor and this was followed by an entertainment consisting of vocal and musical numbers, and the celebration was brought to a close with a dance.

MACCABEE LODGE, NEW YORK.

By far the most interesting event of the year was the joint open installation of officers of Maccabee Lodge and the Daughters of the B'nai B'rith, which took place at the "West End" on Tuesday evening, January 19, 1915. The meeting was opened by the President of the lodge and installing officer, Brother Simon M. Roeder, was escorted into the lodge room by two past presidents. The newly-elected officers of both organizations were then escorted into the room and were installed into office. Brother Roeder complimented the ladies on the good work that they were doing. He pointed out that throughout the history of Israel in times of great trouble, a woman always came forward to save the people from utter destruction. About two hundred and fifty guests attended the affair.

The members of the Daughters of the B'nai B'rith wore their costumes of pale blue and white, embroidered with a gold Menorah.

The newly-elected president of Maccabee Lodge, Brother Rabbi Herbert S. Goldstein, responded fittingly, thanking the installing officer for his excellent address and pledged himself to do his best for the lodge during his administration.

The newly-installed "Malkah" of the Daughters of the B'nai B'rith, Mrs. Ray Rosenbaum, also delivered an address on the aims and objects of the society and urged the ladies present to join the organization.

A beautiful gold watch, with an appropriate engraved inscription, was presented by Maccabee Lodge to its retiring president, Brother Samuel M. Roeder, as a token of gratitude for his able administration. Brother Roeder thanked the members for their kindness and pledged himself to support the new administration.

The patron of the Daughters of the B'nai B'rith, Brother Palitz, was called upon and spoke about the work of organizing the Daughters of the B'nai B'rith and the work still before it which it hoped to accomplish.

Following the installation an entertainment and dance was provided for the members and guests. The entertainment in part, follows:

Recitation ......Miss Tillie Rosenbaum
Vocal Selection ...Miss Anna Levenson
Accompanied by Mrs. Lola Palitz.
Violin Solo .....Miss Helen Silverstein

The numbers were greatly appreciated by the audience.

During the evening the engagement was announced of Brother Alexander Weinstein, assistant monitor of Maccabee Lodge, to Miss Lillian D. Levinson, treasurer of the Daughters of the B'nai B'rith. The romance had its inception in the very same room when the couple were introduced at the installation of officers in 1913. They received the heartiest congratulation of the members of both organizations.

Dancing followed the entertainment and the affair was brought to a close in the early hours of the morning.

MEMPHIS, TENN.

B'nai B'rith Day was celebrated by Memphis Lodge No. 35 of Memphis, Tenn., on Sunday evening, Jan. 31, 1915. An excellent literary and musical program was arranged for the occasion. Rabbi Wm. H. Fineschriber was the orator of the evening, delivering an address on the work of the Order. Dancing concluded the evening's program.

Memphis Lodge has also arranged a unique affair to be given at an early date. Preceding the affair a large class of candidates will be initiated, to be followed by a dollar-a-plate banquet, in which only members of the Order will participate. The supper will be unique in its appointments and the various forms of entertainment for the evening will be presented in an elaborate manner.

HOREB LODGE, NEW HAVEN, CONN.—A RESUME OF ITS ACTIVITIES DURING THE PAST YEAR.

Horeb Lodge No. 25 of New Haven, Conn., installed its officers for the ensuing year at an unusually well attended meeting held on Sunday, Jan. 10, 1915. Mr. Chas. Shapiro of Bridgeport, District Deputy, officiated as installing officer.

During the past year Horeb Lodge was unusually active. Beginning with the very first meeting of the year, when the Lodge celebrated B'nai B'rith Day, there was hardly a meeting that the members did not find it profitable to attend.

Standing out clearly above all other meetings was the one held at the Hotel Taft on Feb. 16, 1914, when President Adolf Kraus of Chicago, visited the Lodge and addressed its members. On this occasion a class of forty candidates was initiated.

On Jan 26th the Lodge was entertained by the B'nai Ami Club of New Haven with a minstrel show at the Lodge room.

On Jan. 27th Rev. Dr. Maurice Harris of New York City delivered an address at the Mishkan Israel Temple under the joint auspices of the Lodge and the Council of Jewish Women.

The life of Wm. McKinley was the subject of an address by Mr. Kaplan at a meeting of the Lodge on Feb. 28th.

The Horeb Lodge charity ball was held on Feb. 18th, proving one of the most brilliant events of the season.

On March 12th the Lodge arranged a minstrel show.

Memorial services were held at the Lodge rooms, at which Rabbi Maurice Thorner of New Haven delivered the memorial address.

On April 26th Mr. Eugene Lehman of New York addressed the Lodge on various phases of B'nai B'rith activity.

At a subsequent meeting Mr. A. H. Fromenson delivered a lecture on the situation of the Jewish people in the various parts of the country.

The annual picnic of the Lodge was held on Aug. 23d and proved a very pleasant open air meeting.

At a meeting held on Sept. 27th Rabbi Louis Mann delivered an address.

On Oct. 25th Prof. Chas. F. Kent of Yale University addressed the Lodge on "Five Universal Ideals of Judaism." At this meeting the Lodge appropriated the sum of $1,000 to the relief fund of the war sufferers.

On Dec. 13th the prize awarded by the judges to Horeb Lodge degree team was presented to the Lodge.

On Dec. 29th a debate, followed by a dance, was held at the Harmony Hall.

The last meeting of the Lodge fittingly marked the close of a busy season. The degree team initiated a large class of candidates. Mr. Harry Cutler of Providence, Past President of District No. 1, was the principal speaker at the meeting.

This resume of the work of the Lodge gives an idea how varied its activities were. The social, charitable and intellectual phases were deeply emphasized. Horeb Lodge stands as the best Jewish organization in the state and this position was reached by untiring work on the part of its officers and members.

NASHVILLE, TENN., MAIMONIDES LODGE.

The annual celebration of B'nai B'rith Day by Maimonides Lodge took place on January 3, 1915. The celebration was in the nature of a Dutch supper at the rooms of the Y. M. H. A. Tables were set in the auditorium and about two hundred guests were present. The greatest enthusiasm and good cheer prevailed. After the wants of the inner man were satisfied speeches were delivered by Rabbi Lewinthal, Nathan Cohn, Perry Bromberg, L. Leftwich, S. Lieberman, Joe Lightman and Squire Levine.

The celebration was productive of great good in that eighteen applications for membership were placed in the hands of the Secretary, and the applicants were elected at the following meeting.

OAKLAND, CAL.

The newly elected officers of Oakland Lodge No. 252 of Oakland, Cal., were installed at the B'nai B'rith hall on Jan. 26, 1914. Mr. Morris N. Schneider, President of the District Grand Lodge, and Rev. Dr. M. Friedlander, Grand Orator, were tendered a reception. This was the first public installation ever held by the Lodge. Many of the Grand Lodge officers were present. Addresses for the good and welfare of the Lodge and the Order were made by the visiting Grand Lodge officers.

What Our Lodges Are Doing

JOINT MEETING OF CENTRAL ILLINOIS LODGES.

An enthusiastic joint meeting of the Lodges of Central Illinois was held on Sunday, January 17, 1915, at Peoria. Over 100 guests from Danville, Springfield, Bloomington, Champaign, Urbana and Lincoln were present. Progress Lodge No. 113 of Peoria acted as host and at a meeting of the Lodge held in the morning a class of candidates was initiated. After the Lodge adjourned the visiting members were taken in charge by the local members of Peoria and entertained at private homes for dinner.

In the afternoon all re-assembled to listen to a masterly oration by Rev. Dr. E. N. Calisch of Richmond, Va., member of the Executive Committee of the Order. His subject was "The Future of Palestine."

At the banquet held at the Jefferson Hotel in the evening Mr. Wm. B. Woolner presided as toastmaster and addresses were delivered by Brothers Julius H. Meyer of Chicago, Sig Livingston of Bloomington, and Rabbi Tedesche of Springfield.

JOINT INSTALLATION OF OFFICERS BY JORDAN AND WASHINGTON LODGES.

On Jan. 7th, 1915, there was held at the meeting place of Jordan Lodge No. 15 of New York City a joint installation, at which Bro. Chas. Hartman, Executive Committee member and Past President of District No. 1, presided as installing officer. The meeting was one of the most successful of its kind ever conducted, and drew an unusually large attendance. There were present, besides the members of the two Lodges, many visiting brethren, among whom was Bro. Joseph Ullman, Past President of the District. The General Committee of the District was also represented by Bros. Asher, Fleischman, Davidson, Rosensweig and Lipsitch.

The evening began with the affiliation with Washington Lodge of Bro. Reverend G. Lipkind, formerly of St. Louis, and Bro. Biero. Then followed an initiation of four members by the Washington Lodge degree team. The retiring President of Jordan Lodge, Bro. Kraus, then read his report of the activities for 1914; he made an eloquent address, and won the prolonged applause of the audience. The installation of the officers of the two Lodges was followed by an address by Bro. Dr. M. M. Stark, re-elected for a second term. Short addresses were made by the following: Bro. S. J. Friedlander, newly elected President of Jordan Lodge, Bro. Rev. Kaplin of Sacramento, Bro. Joseph Ullman, and Bro. Rev. G. Lipkind. The evening was concluded with refreshments.

EAU CLAIRE, WIS.

Chippewa Valley Lodge No. 334 of Eau Claire, Wis., celebrated B'nai B'rith Day at a well attended meeting on Sunday, Jan. 24, 1915. The celebration consisted of a business meeting in the afternoon, at which the installation of officers was held and conducted by Brother H. D. Frankel of St. Paul, specially delegated by the President of the District to represent the Grand Lodge. Brother Frankel addressed the Lodge on the work of the Order and in the evening a public meeting was held at which a musical program was carried out. The principal address was delivered by Brother Frankel on the aims of the Order and the problems which confront the Order as a result of the present crisis in Europe.

Chippewa Valley Lodge was organized in 1882 and has the unique distinction of never having missed a regular meeting or failed to have a quorum during its existence. The Lodge is taking care of Jewish charitable work of the community and also has charge of the religious services on holidays.

PORTLAND, ORE.

What promises to be a banner year for Theo. Herzl Lodge No. 314 of Portland, Ore., opened under splendid auspices and general good feeling at a meeting of the Lodge held on Jan 12, 1915 at which the newly elected officers were installed. Various committees were appointed to serve during the year and a most successful year is predicted for the Lodge.

MOBILE, ALA.

B'nai B'rith Day was celebrated by Beth Zur Lodge No. 84 of Mobile, Ala., on Sunday, Jan. 31, 1915, in the B'nai B'rith hall with the following program:

1. Organ Prelude.
2. Invocation, Brother Alfred G. Moses.
3. Song—"Nur wer die Sehnsucht kennt," Tschaikowsky — Mrs. Heyman Gabriel, Mrs. Ignatius Fried, Violin Obligato.
4. Recitation—"A Legend of Service," Henry Van Dyke—Miss Hortense Reiss.
5. Cello Solo–Romance Sans Paroles, Van Goens—Brother Hans Curjel.
6. Introduction — Brother Leo. M. Brown, Chairman Intellectual Culture Committee, Beth Zur Lodge.
7. Address—"Our Ideals in the Light of the New Social Conscience"—Brother Emil W. Leipziger, Rabbi, Touro Synagogue, New Orleans.
8. Song — "O, Divine Redeemer," Gounod—Mrs. I. N. Frenkel.
9. Benediction — Brother Alfred G. Moses.
10. Organ Postlude—Mrs. Hans Curjel, Organist.

FT. SMITH, ARK.

With an enthusiastic audience present at the evening's program and a large attendance of the members of the Lodge at the regular session, Ft. Smith Lodge No. 306 of Ft. Smith, Ark., celebrated B'nai B'rith Day on Sunday, Jan. 24, 1915. Rabbi Jos. Jasin of Pine Bluff, Ark., and Brother Louis Cohen, member of the General Committee of the District Grand Lodge, represented the Grand Lodge at the celebration.

At the afternoon meeting of the Lodge a class of candidates was initiated. The evening's program took place at the Progress Club, the principal address being delivered by Rabbi Jasin. This was followed by brief remarks by Rabbi Latz and Simon Joel, one of the oldest members of the Lodge. The program was interspersed with musical and vocal numbers. Brother Louis Cohen officiated as master of ceremonies. Refreshments were served and dancing was enjoyed after the program.

CHARITY BALL OF HARMONY LODGE, BRIDGEPORT, CONN.

More than one thousand brilliantly gowned women and their escorts attended the second annual charity ball given by Harmony Lodge No. 711 of Bridgeport, Conn., on Jan. 27, 1915.

Though last year's affair was remarkably successful, this year's ball eclipsed it in every way. Lieut.-Governor and Mrs. Wilson opened the ball and occupied a box during part of the evening.

From a financial side the ball was fully as successful as last year and it is estimated that more than $1,000 was the net result, which will go to help the work of various Jewish charitable institutions.

There were many out-of-town guests from New York, New Haven, Hartford, Stamford, Waterbury, Providence and other cities.

APPLETON, WIS.

A public installation of officers of Fox River Lodge No. 209 of Appleton, Wis., was held on Sunday, January 24, 1915. The meeting was well attended. The retiring President, Brother G. Ullman, opened the meeting with appropriate remarks. He was followed by Brother Leop. Hammel of Milwaukee, who officiated in the ceremony of installing the officers and delivered an address after the installation, which was greatly appreciated. Rabbi E. Gerechter delivered the principal address on the occasion, giving the history of the Order, its work and accomplishments.

BELLINGHAM, WASH.

The installation of officers of Bellingham Lodge No. 751 was an important Jewish event in that community. A delegation from Seattle, Wash., composed of many of its prominent members, was present to install the officers. At its conclusion addresses were made by the visiting brothers and many of the local members. A musical program of various numbers was rendered and at the close of the evening refreshments were served and dancing was indulged in.

GRAND FORKS, N. D.

Dacotah Lodge No. 731 of Grand Forks, N. D., celebrated B'nai B'rith Day on Sunday, Jan. 10, 1915. The celebration was ushered in with a regular meeting of the Lodge in the afternoon, at which a class of candidates was initiated by the degree team of the Lodge.

During the past year the Lodge bent its efforts toward securing the membership of Jewish students attending the University of North Dakota, and at the end of the year the Lodge can point with pride to the fact that every enrolled Jewish student at the State University is affiliated with the Lodge.

In the evening a public meeting was held, at which the installation of officers was conducted by Brother H. D. Frankel of St. Paul, special representative of District Grand Lodge No. 6. The program consisted of an opening address by President Sig Wolff, musical and vocal numbers, installation ceremonies conducted by Brother Frankel, address by Brother J. B. Weineman, a recitation by Miss Wolff, and an address by Brother H. D. Frankel on the subject, "The Spirit of Humility."

During the evening's exercises Brother Sig Wolff was presented with a loving cup in recognition of his splendid services rendered to the Lodge as its first President, having held this office for two consecutive terms.

Much credit is due to the Intellectual Advancement Committee for the splendid arrangements and the excellent program', which was followed by a dance for the members and their families.

VIRGINIA, MINN.

The fifth anniversary of the institution of Mesaba Lodge No. 673 of Virginia, Minn., and the annual B'nai B'rith Day were jointly celebrated at Virginia, Minn., on Jan. 17, 1915. The celebration consisted of a business session, at which a class of candidates was initiated, a banquet and a dance.

At the celebration the needs of the European war sufferers were touched upon and a fund of over $500 was gathered from among those present. The banquet was largely attended by the members and their friends from all sections of the Range. Mr. Ben Wilk officiated as toastmaster and Brother H. D. Frankel of St. Paul was the guest of honor and the principal speaker, delivering an address at the business meeting of the Lodge on the subject, "Necessity for Organization," and at the banquet on "Fraternal Sacrifice." An address was also delivered by Rabbi Jos. Silver and short talks made by several members of the Lodge.

The Ladies' Aid of the Congregation prepared a banquet, and after its conclusion, the remainder of the evening up to the early hours of the morning, was spent in pleasant social diversion.

LANSING, MICH.

Jacob H. Schiff Lodge No. 694 of Lansing, Mich., held an enthusiastic meeting on Sunday, Jan. 17, 1915. Brothers Henry M. Seligman of Chicago, District Deputy for Illinois; Edward Lichtig and A. B. Roman of Bay City, representing the Grand Lodge, paid the Lodge an official visit. A class of six candidates were initiated by the visiting brothers and this was followed by the installation of the newly elected officers. The visiting Grand Lodge officers addressed the Lodge on the work of the Order and complimented the Lodge upon the interest and earnestness displayed by it in the work of the Order.

SAMUEL LODGE, VANCOUVER, B. C.

On Jan. 20, 1915, the first of a series of monthly socials and educational evenings was held under the auspices of Samuel Lodge of Vancouver, B. C. President M. M. Grossman in his opening address dwelt on the work of the Order and its influence for good that it wields in every Jewish community. Brother A. H. Fleischman, prominent attorney and Chairman of the Educational Committee, read an interesting paper on the Canadian Constitution, dwelling on the freedom and equality enjoyed by Jews under the British Empire. A musical program was then carried out and at its conclusion dancing followed.

JOINT MEETING OF SAN FRANCISCO LODGES.

Several hundred members of the various San Francisco Lodges attended the joint meeting in the B'nai B'rith hall on Jan. 25, 1915, in response to a call issued by Grand President Morris Schneider. The purpose of the gathering was to review the work of the President of the District and his assistants prior to the holding of the annual convention of the Grand Lodge. Brother Schneider in a clear and concise statement informed those present of what had been accomplished during the preceding year, notably the installation of new Lodges in Berkeley, Bakersfield, Tucson, Reno, Everett, Victoria, Aberdeen, Bellingham, Helena, Mont. He specially emphasized the fact that as a direct result of the establishment of a B'nai B'rith Lodge at Bakersfield the preliminary steps have been taken for the erection of a synagogue in that city. Grand Orator Dr. Friedlander and Past Grand President Lucius L. Solomons also addressed the gathering. The meeting was the largest and most interesting held during the season.

ARGO LODGE, WASHINGTON, D. C.

The regular monthlv meeting of Argo Lodge No. 413, of Washington, D. C. was held in the vestry rooms of the Eighth Street Temple, on Jan. 27, 1915, when, in the presence of more than a hundred members the officers were installed, by Past Grand President Brother Julius I. Peyser. Four of the officers installed are under the age of twenty-seven years and are members of the bar of the District of Columbia, Argo Lodge being particularly proud of the number of young men she has interested in the cause of the Order. The roster of Argo Lodge contains nearly all the Jewish professional men of Washington and many of the leading business men.

An enthusiastic committee is at present working upon plans for holding an annual "get-together banquet" of the lodge, at which function prominent men of national reputation will be present to deliver addresses.

It is the aim of the present officers of the lodge to make the meetings not only interesting, but also instructive, and a committee has been appointed for the purpose of outlining and arranging intellectual features for each meeting of the lodge.

RICHMOND, VA.

The regular meeting of Rimmon Lodge No. 68 was held in the Temple Sunday night, January 24, 1915, for the purpose of installing officers for the ensuing year.

Bro. Harold S. Bloomberg, Vice-President of District No. 5, presided as the representative from the Grand Lodge, and installed the officers.

After the installation, which was conducted in an impressive manner, an instructive paper was read by Bro. Edwin M. Heller on "Social Recognition of the Jew," which was followed by a most interesting discussion by Brother Charles Hutzler, contrasting the social condition of the Jews in former times with those of today. Dr. Lazarus Karp gave a talk on the American Jew's duty to his European brother, dealing mostly with the Russian situation.

At the close of the business meeting refreshments were served and a round table discussion was had for the good of the Order.

NEW ORLEANS, LA.

A meeting of the joint committee of the New Orleans Lodges was held on Jan. 20, 1915, in the Y. M. H. A. Building, with Chairman Sam Blum in the chair. The main feature of the business session was the resolution to continue efforts to raise funds for the Jewish war sufferers. A circular letter by Rabbi E. W. Leipziger on this subject was read and approved and will be mailed to the Jewish people who have not as yet been personally reached.

Consideration of the proposition to secure a home for the Lodges was deferred until a future meeting.

At the suggestion of Brother A. Steeg a committee was appointed to look into the advisability of arranging a public Seder and to report at the next meeting of the committee.

What Our Lodges Are Doing

RAINIER LODGE, SEATTLE, WASH.

The newly elected officers of Rainier Lodge No. 627 of Seattle, Wash., were installed in office at a well attended meeting held on Jan. 14, 1915. The occasion was marked by the presence of a goodly number of distinguished members of several of the sister Lodges. In assuming the chair the new President, Brother Lewis, delivered an address outlining many things of importance which he hoped the Lodge would handle during his term of office. Short talks were also made by the other officers, and from the enthusiasm displayed by them and the members of the Lodge a banner year for Rainier Lodge is in view.

WM. McKINLEY LODGE, OMAHA, NEB.

Wm. McKinley Lodge No. 521 of Omaha, Nebr., held a joint installation of officers with its Ladies Auxiliary on January 14, 1915. Brother Arthur Rosenbloom presided and officiated in the installation of officers assisted by Brother Harry Wolf.

Short addresses were made by Brothers Auerbach, Wolf, Katleman, and the Misses Grodinsky and Fleischman. Miss Miriam Davis delivered several interesting readings and the evening was concluded by the serving of refreshments by the Ladies Auxiliary.

DISTRICT NO. 1.

Jordan Lodge No. 15 of New York held a well attended meeting on Feb. 4, 1915, at which a class of candidates was initiated. At the close of the regular meeting a special meeting was called to order, at which an appropriation of $400.00 was made from the Lodge Treasury toward the B'nai B'rith relief fund for war sufferers.

Chananiah Lodge No. 165 of New York City, held a public installation on January 3, 1915, at which a very large attendance of members, visitors and ladies were present. Bro. Joseph Rosenzweig, a member of the General Committee of District No. 1, after installing the newly-elected officers, delivered an eloquent address, appealing to the ladies to urge their sons and brothers to assist in the great work before us, in order that our numbers may be strengthened and all Israelites brought together under our banner. Responses were made by Brothers H. Weiss, S. Gallinger and V. Freitag of Chananiah Lodge. The meeting was a very enthusiastic one and good results are expected from it.

CHEER MAYOR WRIGHT.

He Says Organization Is Doing Much for Uplift of Mankind.

Mayor Wright was cheered when he arose to speak. He said: "There is but little difference between us after all. Those of us who have lived here all our lives hardly realize as do those who come here from other countries, the splendid opportunities this country offers.

"The B'nai Brith is certainly a splendid organization. It is doing so much for the uplift of mankind. The fact that your organization has opened an orphanage at Erie, Pa., is an indication of your great work. We, of Worcester, have a lovely city; one that means a great deal to us. It has been built up by brains and industry. It is growing rapidly. Some of my warmest friends are Hebrews, men, young and old, who have been associated with me since I entered into public life. I hope that your organization may continue to carry on its good work."

IN EVERY NATION.

Rev. Dr. Calisch Says B'nai B'rith Is Doing Good Work.

Rev. Dr. Calisch said: "What the American government has done for humanity at large, the B'nai B'rith has done for the Hebrew people. The B'nai B'rith since its beginning has spelled opportunity, unity and cohesion for the Hebrew people. For 75 years it has been the training school for the Hebrews of America in religious enthusiasm and patriotism. I need not recount our work in philanthropy. Without forsaking any of its principles the order has proceeded still higher than its original aims.

"The order has proceeded until it has become international. Its work is being done in every nation on the face of the earth. It has even stretched its hand out to help the afflicted of Palestine.

"You will pardon me for digressing but I want to speak of Palestine. I will say frankly that while I am not a Zionist and do not agree with many of the principles of Zionism, I admire the work that Zionism is doing. The thought of the Holy Land stirs the heart within me as it does the heart of every Hebrew. We must be stirred by the land which was the cradle of humanity's progress.

"What will be the future of Palestine as the result of this war? Whatever side wins there is no doubt that there will be a change in Palestine and the condition of the Hebrews will be vitally affected. Palestine has not been an independent Hebrew possession for any length of time. About 400 years will cover the time it has been an independent Hebrew state. Palestine is so closely interwoven with things Jewish that we turn toward it.

"If Germany wins in the great struggle there is no doubt Turkey will remain in possession of Palestine. The government of Turkey in Palestine has been never bad from a Hebrew standpoint as compared with the sufferings in Roumania, Russia and other countries.

"Diplomatically and politically speaking every nation would like to control Palestine. Russia most of all, Russia would like to make it to Greek Catholicism what Rome is to Roman Catholicism. Palestine should never be the posession of any single power. Palestine is the one place in all the world which should be absolutely neutral. It should be the ark of humanity's hope, never to be approached with violence or military power.

"Who shall possess Palestine? I say anyone should be allowed to go there who wants to. Most of all it should be the possession of a people who never have been accused in any way as a people; a people who have no political affiliation, but are scattered the world over. It should be given to the Jews, so that they may take care of its splendid traditions; not for the sake of the Jews; not for the sake of the Jewish state, not for a selfish purpose as a refuge from persecution, but a haven and an inspiration for the world at large; a place where unhampered and unrestricted the Jews may work up the ideals of Jewish culture; a country that will not compete with other countries; to be a model state for all countries of the world.

"For 2000 years the world has been under the control of the church. Now give the Jews 200 years in whcih to work out their own salvation and if they do not do so let their claims, hopes and boasts cease. I have full confidence in what Judaism means. I have an unshakable faith in what Jewish aspirations bring forth. In my dream of Palestine it will be a nation of righteousness."

ON CIVILIZATION.

Rev. Dr. Silverman Says We Are Little Better Than Savages.

Rev. Dr. Silverman spoke on "The higher civilization." He said: "Twenty-seven hundred years ago, the prophet declared. 'They shall beat their swords into plowshares and their spears into pruning hooks, and nations shall learn the arts of war no more.' Contrast this declaration with the modern proclamation of war and ask yourself which indicates the higher civilization.

"In what respect are we better than the savages? He goes forth with his bow and arrow and with one shot can at best wound or kill one human being, but today civilization has given one soldier the power to simply pressing the button to kill with one shot thousands of human beings and destroy millions of dollars worth of property.

"But they tell us that civilization has humanized warfare by sending the Red Cross nurse and surgeon to the firing line. But to assuage the destruction of modern warfare with lint and liniment seems like an attempt to stop the flow of Niagara with the palm of your hand. Civilization put an end to private dueling, but permits dueling on a wholesalé scale between nation and nation.

"In justification of the war, they tell us that national honor is something different from individual honor, that the individual can submit his personal honor and his personal rights to the adjudication of the court, but that a nation must determine its honor and its right by the power of the sword. In other words, the old law of the barbarian, that might makes right, still holds good.

"We need a higher civilization which shall give a new meaning to national honor. The pride of a nation shall not consist in its military ability to hold the whole world at bay, but in its power to submit what it regards as its rights to arbitration.

"We need a new meaning of patriotism. Today it means love of country which really spells willingness to sacrifice one's life in any cause. My country, right or wrong, is the slogan of the modern patriot. The higher civilization will teach a new slogan: My country when it is right, my country may it always be right; my country when it is wrong, may God give me the power to set it right.

"War is due also to the fact that every nation is indifferent or hostile to the foreigner. National lines are sharply drawn. Ben Johnson said: 'All foreigners are fools.' And the spirit of hostility among nations reflects that sentiment.

"The newer civilization will teach a different international spirit which shall translate the words, 'thou shalt love thy fellow man as thyself' and to the slogan, 'thou shalt love thy sister nation as thine own.' This broader internationalism will obliterate border lines and barriers, and make possible the United States of the world on the same basis that the United States of America has become possible. That basis will be one common constitution and one common flag under the authority of an international court.

"The B'nai B'rith order, standing as it does for fraternity, for unity and for co-operation, in effect advocates the spirit of this new internationalism which is equivalent to a universal brotherhood."

LOYALTY TO THE ORDER.

President Asher urged co-operation and earnest effort to make District No. 1 and the Order count for most in realizing its ideals and for the promotion of good citizenship and relief of the needy.

Mr. Hartman in his remarks bespoke loyalty to the Order and dwelt upon the creditable part that the Jews are playing in the European war. He also recited measures taken by the Order in European countries to afford relief to refugees and to those suffering directly from the war.

Judge Cohen dwelt on the unrest existing in the country between capital and labor and urged the Order to take a strong part in lines of social welfare and social service.

Col. Cutler recited the work done by the Jews in connection with the present war, of the heroism they display on the battlefield, and of the sacrifices they are making for the countries in which they dwell.

Mr. Stern urged the members of the District to rally loyally around the President of the District and paid tribute to the services rendered by President Asher in the various offices that he filled.

Monday Morning's Session.

Monday morning's session was devoted to reports of committees and consideration of various resolutions.

A committee was appointed to look into the matter of non-employment in the District and particularly in the east side of New York.

During the afternoon session the President announced the appointment of the General Committee. Various subject matters referred to standing committees were considered and disposed of and late in the afternoon the convention was brought to a close with benediction by Rev. B. Cohn of Buffalo and hearty cheers for the newly elected President, Brother Herman Asher, whose earnestness and genial personality have won for him the love and respect of the District.

During the afternoon the women visitors were entertained by a trip to the Royal Worcester Corset Company in special automobiles. The plant was inspected and tea was served in the restaurant.

In the evening after the convention was adjourned a big ball was held in the ball room of the hotel, which was attended by many hundreds of people.

AN INSULTING ADDRESS.

In an address by Sir Reginald Wingate to the Sheikh's at Khartum as published in the London Times, the following sentence occurs:

"Not content with the overthrow of the Sultan Abdul Hamid (who, as you know, has warned them of the consequences of their policy), unrestrained by the loss, through their mismanagement and mal-administration of the European and other former provinces of their Empire, reckless of the simmering discontent of the peoples — other than those of Turkish races — within their Empire, these men—this syndicate of Jews, financiers, and low-born intriguers—like broken gamblers staking their last coin, and in deference to the urgent demands of Germany and our enemies—have gone to war with the one Power who, by her actions and the sentiments of her people, has ever been a true and sympathetic friend to the Moslems and to Islam."

AMERICAN JEWISH HISTORICAL SOCIETY'S TWENTY-THIRD ANNUAL MEETING.

The twenty-third annual meeting of the society will be held in the city of New York on Sunday and Monday, February 21 and 22, 1915, at the Hotel McAlpine. The public is invited to attend the sessions.

Papers on various subjects will be presented by leading men and educators.

HYPHENATED JEWS

By Dr. Max L. Margolis

The term "hyphenated" when applied to citizenship has latterly been much in evidence, and one of our dailies has even enriched the English language by the coinage "hyphenationality." The question of dual and even of multiple citizenship has, however, formed the subject of debate in the Jewish press for a much longer period. A scholar of eminent reputation reminded me the other day of a quarrel to which he was an unwilling party several years ago. He had then announced his allegiance to a certain Jewish party calling itself nationalist. Whereupon aspersions were cast in open letters upon the patriotism of nationalist Jews. Now, says this gentleman at the present moment, my Jewishness of the nationalist variety and my Americanism had not the remotest chance of clashing in any practical shape for a million of years if at all, while here before our eyes gentlemen of the hyphenated American variety, and if they be Jews, of the trebly hyphenated kind, are daily placed before the dilemma of serving the interests of this country or those of the country of their birth, and that in a manner so tangible, so fraught with consequences of the most far-reaching character.

Of course, no American in his senses will for a moment doubt the patriotism of the most vociferous citizen of German or Irish or any other extraction. We have been wont to believe that this mill of ours ground the foreigner down so thoroughly that in a generation he was assimilated to all intents and purposes. Was not this land nicknamed the world's gigantic melting-pot? Certainly in a political sense the melting process was undeniable. The spectre of dual citizenship never obtruded itself. And we may without fear of contradiction venture the assertion that when it comes to a real issue and the citizen of foreign birth or antecedents finds his country in a clash with a European power that every one of us will with undivided allegiance rally to the support of the flag.

The Jew's allegiance to the cause of his people could not of course at any time or by any stretch of the imagination be viewed with suspicion from the point of view of citizenship. Witness the part which the Jews are nobly playing in their several fatherlands in the European entanglement. Even Jews of Zionist affiliations have willingly flocked to the colors and just as heroically met death on the battlefields. The Jewish allegiance to Judaism in all of its forms partakes of the cultural, aye, of the religious kind. The Jew will not forget that he has a history behind him, that he has a message to the world, and that he hopes for a place in the world, for a position in the world which shall be one of dignity. Beyond that he is a faithful son of the country which he makes his own. Sometimes he carries with him a superallegiance to his former fatherland. The Portuguese Jew still decorates his Scroll of the Law with the colors of Spain and Portugal. He carries with him a sentiment which is all the more honorable if we remember that Spain and Portugal expelled him.

And so it was in ancient days. In the Roman empire he was found everywhere. There was not a city or hamlet which did not harbor a member of our race. There is no theorizing in the face of history. Life is more complicated than theory. The dispersion of Jewry began at an early date. In Palestine, while Temple stood and the country enjoyed a semblance of autonomy, Jewish citizenship was of the unhyphenated kind. For the overlord was far away, and men find their sentiments prescribed by the nearer interests. Matters may stand thus even in the Ottoman Palestine of today. Things will be the same if Palestine should change hands tomorrow. For the memories of history are stronger than matters of overlordship. But in the dispersion the status of the Jew unless he became a renegade was bound to be less simple. When Egypt had become a Roman province, the Jews of that land remembered that they belonged to different strata and layers of migration. Quite as with us, the older the ancestry the more it made for nobility. There had been Jews in Egypt before the Greek came there to impose his rule over the native. They had been there since Persian times and they persisted to register themselves as Persians, at the same time calling themselves Jews, They were Roman-Egyptian-Persian Jews. And if their language were to be taken into account, Aramean or Syrian might be added to the list of adjectives. In the year 59 of our era under the reign of Nero we find Jews as signatories to a promissory note executed in an Egyptian village. They are Petos, the son of Hilkiah, and his sons Hilkiah and his brother whose name cannot be read. Petos is an Egyptian name. Jews always adopted names from the enviornment. Isidore—the gift of Isis—was originally an Egyptian name; today it has become quite Jewish. That the grandson is named after his grandfather is a custom with which every Jew is acquainted. All three of them call themselves Jews, but they are registered as Persians, and they reside in the Syrians' village.

And so it has been throughout the ages. And even as with us, the Jews of antiquity sometimes designate themselves as Hebrews. But whether Jew or Hebrew, it meant the consciousness of stock and of association with a historic past. Beyond that, in the words of Philo, the Jews, though acknowledging Palestine their common fatherland or cradle of the people's birth, cherished their various fatherlands. They prayed in conformity with the advice of Jeremiah for the welfare of the city in which they lived. In modern times, they take upon themselves to the full and without reservation the obligations which the citizenship bestowed upon them involves. Aye, even in lands of persecution, where they are still legally discriminated against, where in times of peace they are hated and persecuted and victimized and harassed, they evince their patriotism by fighting in the armies for a cause which is not their own. The Jew in Poland for instance is muchly hyphenated. He is a Jew from the stock of Judah; he is of German antecedents as his speech will readily betray him; he is a Pole despite the ingratitude of the dominant race, for he will not forget how the Polish kings offered him a refuge and how he shared the fortunes of the land taking up arms on behalf of Polish independence, and he is a Russian, a step-son of Russia, but nevertheless loyal.

Unless we brush aside history, the Jew everywhere cannot but be hyphenated. No matter where his sentiments may stand, no matter what his silent hope may be for the future, he questions not his duty to the land he calls his own at the moment. He is politically one, though as a product of history his antecedents are many.

RUSSIAN RESPECT FOR AMERICA

When the Russians marched into Rzeszow, in Galicia, an American citizen, Mendel Bigaier, who came there to visit his relatives, was among others suddenly attacked by Cossacks, and robbed of 1,300 kronen in the presence of the commanding officer. Bigaier said indignantly to the commander:

"Sir, you have not led soldiers here, but robbers!" The commander answered: "You will be hanged within a half hour," and ordered his men to lead the Jew away. Bigaier told him in the last moment: "You will pay dearly for this. I am an American citizen." The Russian made inquiries and learned that Bigaier was really from New York and an American citizen, and he was immediately released.

IS THE FOREIGNER CAPABLE OF CITIZENSHIP AND ACHIEVEMENT?

Extract of a Speech Delivered on the Immigration Question by Senator James A. Reed of Missouri

Shall we consider the Jew?

Seek the source of the century-old horrors he has endured and you will enter the caverns of ignorance where dwells the serpent of superstition and its pestilential offspring, persecution.

The Jew has been, and in some places still is, an outcast simply and only because he has steadfastly refused to abandon the God of his fathers.

For this 3,000 years ago were his burdens in Egypt made greater than he could bear. For this were his cities burned, the walls of his capital razed, his temples destroyed, his altars desecrated, his people slaughtered; for this was he carried into captivity by Syrian and Babylonian despots, his land reduced to a desert sown with the bones of murdered millions. Yet, in spite of all, for fifteen hundred years the Jew clung to the horns of his altar, cherished his temple, and reverenced his God.

For fifteen centuries the world was enveloped in the night of bigotry, ignorance, and terror—a night illumined by a single torch of truth, held aloft by the hand of the Jew.

The Jew alone during all that period of terror, vice, tyranny, despair and loathsome idolatry taught the doctrine of one Supreme God. He alone followed a code of laws which embraced every principle essential to liberty, morality, and religion. His laws and his religion were to those of the other nations of the earth as a star of indescribable glory shining through the clouds of a stormrent sky upon a sea of blood.

Then came the dawn of Christianity, but its glory fell first upon the land of the Jew. The God mother was a Jewess. The Twelve Disciples were Hebrew fishermen who spread their nets along the shores of the sea of Galilee.

From this race we get our religion, from its sacred writings our morals. It preserved the greater part of our knowledge of ancient history. The sublimest examples of sacred poetry and the tenderest expressions of exalted devotion fell from the pens of inspired Jews.

Obliterate the work of the Jew before the Christian era and you destroy the old Bible and the Ten Commandments. Strike out the work of the Jew of the Christian era and you obliterate the New Testament.

Your religion, the fundamentals of your laws, your ideas of virtue, your precepts of morality—all these you get from the Jew. From the lips of the son of a Jewess came the sublime command, "Do unto others as you would they should do unto you."

If you say some of the Jews crucified the Savior, I answer it was also Jews who followed Him to Calvary. It was a Jew who drew the nails from the cross. It was Jews who reverently bore the body to the sepulcher. It was Jews who awaited the glory of the resurrection. It was Jews to whom He appeared; with whom He walked and talked.

It was these same Jews who went into all the world teaching His word. They were beaten; they were imprisoned; they were fed to wild beasts by those they came to save. They gave their lives to the propagation of Christianity. The race has ever since been persecuted by those whom a part of the race converted.

But as civilization has progressed, as the light of reason has penetrated the night of ignorance, as man has emerged from the jungles of barbarism and approached the sun-lit plains of civilization, persecution of the Jew has lapsed or ceased. Only Russia and one or two others of the tardy nations continue the diabolic practice. Let us not become either assistants or parties to the infernal policy.

If you were to name the 10 greatest statesmen of the century, you would be compelled to include the elder Disraeli, an English Jew.

If you were to name the 10 greatest judges, you would include in the list a Jew, Rufus Daniel Isaacs, lord chief justice of England.

If you were to think of great lawyers of the century, your mind would call up the name of Juda P. Benjamin, attorney general of the Confederacy, and remember him as a Jew.

If you were asked to name the foremost actress of the world, you would instantly think of Sarah Bernhardt, a French Jewess.

If you were asked to call the name of a master of music, you would remember Anton Rubenstein.

If you were to pursue your inquiry, you would find that in law, medicine, literature, science, philanthropy, art, and in business the Jew has held his own with competitors of every race.

Let me quote you the words of Joaquin Miller:

Who taught you tender Bible tales
Of honey lands, of milk and wine?
Of happy, peaceful Palestine?
Of Jordan's holy harvest vales?
Who gave the patient Christ? I say,
Who gave your Christian creed? Yes; yes;
Who gave your very God to you?
Your Jew! Your Jew! Your hated Jew!

The "Jewish Kings" of the Provence

The Museum of Narbonne possesses a Jewish seal from the end of the thirteenth or the beginning of the fourteenth century. It originated at the time when to have a coat of arms was no longer the exclusive prerogative of the nobility, and the prominent citizens in the towns commenced to provide themselves with them.

The seal consists of two sides, and shows a rising lion in heraldic form. The inscription of the name is on one side in the language of the Provence and on the other in Hebrew. The seal belonged to Moment Tauras, or Kalonymos ben Todras III., of the old rich family of "Jewish Kings," in which the office of warden of the community of Narbonne was hereditary. The author of a study of the history of the community of Narbonne writes in the "Revue des Etudes Juifes" that the name "Roi-Juif" is of Christian origin, and is an erroneous interpretation of the Hebrew title of warden. The family derived its origin from a scholar who was called from Babylon by Charles the Great to establish a Talmudic school at Narbonne after the model of the Babylonian academy. These Jewish scholars in Babylon claimed to be of the royal blood of David. Perhaps the heraldic lion upon the seal of Moment Tauras is to remind of the "lion of Judah." Up to the middle of the thirteenth century these Provencal Jewish Kings were allodial lords who stood directly under the French King. Rich allodial possessions were acquired by the Jews in southern France in Gallic-Roman times, however, without court jurisdiction and without the power to summon the subjects to war. So it remained under the Merovingian and Carolingian governments. The feudal times drove the smaller Jewish allodial possessors, just as they did the Christian owners, to place themselves as fief holders under the protection of mightier lords. They also appear as fief holders from abbeys and bishops. The hostility of the Christians which arose with the Crusades caused the Jewish landowners to turn their possessions gradually into cash. When the great confiscation came in 1306 only about 30 houses were found in the possession of the "Jewish Kings," they had wisely sold their allodial possessions several decades before. — (Israelitisches Wochenblatt.)

How Russia is Treating the Jews

The foreign committee of the Jewish Socialist party of Russia has issued an appeal to the civilized world regarding treatment of Jews in Russia. The appeal says:

"At the time when the Governments of each of the warring countries, for reasons of the defense of the realm, avoid any acts which might disturb the internal peace of the country or might strain the relations between Government and people, Russian autocracy, while overtly calling upon all the nationalities of Russia to 'unite' with the Government, in reality continues its old traditional policy of oppression and, under the cover of the exceptional situation created by the war, settles its account with the democratic and opposition elements of the country. . . . ."

After describing the attitude of the Russian Government towards the Finns and the Poles, the pronouncement continues:—

The ultra-reactionary nature of the autocratic regime, however, comes out most saliently in the persecution of the Jews. The position of the Jews in Russia always was, and even now remains, the true indicator of the general political condition of the country. Anti-Semitism is the pivot on which the domestic policy of the Russian Government is turning. Anti-Semitism is a means of poisoning the consciousness of the masses of the Russian people. By means of anti-Semitism the Russian Government is taking vengeance on the Jews for having produced many courageous fighters against political despotism. This vengeance is visited even upon those whose forefathers have broken away from Jewry. Christian students "whose fathers or grandfathers were of the Jewish faith" are not admitted to the Accelerated Courses for Training of Officers opened during the war. So far does the petty vindictiveness of the Government of the Tsar go!

The Pale of Settlement

We shall not dwell on the exceptional legal status of the Jews; the disabilities of the latter have not altered a jot. The most truculent limitations, like the prohibition to reside outside the fixed "pale of settlement," the prohibition to pursue certain trades and professions, the closing to the Jews of all civil and communal posts, the restrictions to a small percentage of the number of Jewish students admitted in educational institutions, all this remains in full force. Neither has the local administration relaxed its practice of confiscating Jewish property, of organizing night hunts on Jews "illegally" residing outside the "Pale of Settlement," etc., etc. All these are constant elements of Jewish disabilities.

In this document, however, we desire to draw the attention of the civilized world to the outrages perpetrated on the Jews under cover of the military situation, outrages unprecedented even in the annals of Tsardom. The Government has started a crusade of extermination against the Jews, which, in the zone of military operations, is assuming, the form of a punitive expedition.

Poland

The main theater of war in Russia is Poland and a few Lithuanian provinces which form part of the Jewish Pale of Settlement. The Jewish population of this locality is absolutely ruined by the war, and the great majority is literally starving. The terrible poverty and the invasion of the enemy compelled the Jews to flee in thousands from their homes; and here the apprehensive Russian Government interfered. It took precautions not to allow a single Jew to escape beyond the limits of the Ghetto. In the towns outside the Pale of Settlement, thorough searches are made for Jews; night hunts are organized in quarters where Jews are likely to find shelter, they are arrested, subjected to punishment for "willful arrival" at places outside the Pale, and then sent back to the ruined localities whence they escaped. Even Jewish soldiers, wounded and maimed on the battlefield, and undergoing treatment in Central Russia, are driven back to the "Pale" immediately they are in a condition to leave the hospital. All petitions sent by people who have suffered by the war, asking for permission to cross the "Pale" and thus escape death from starvation, are usually declined with the cynical remark: "No legal grounds for granting same."

Refugees from Poland

Public opinion in Western Europe will stand aghast at the fact that while Switzerland, France and Britain are receiving with every kindness and care the Belgian refugees, the Russian Government is, on the contrary, denying, with surprising cruelty, its own subjects the elementary right of free movement, and is thus condemning them to incalculable suffering.

Nay—more than that—a series of "pogroms" were started in Poland with the connivance of the military and civil authorities. In these "pogroms" the soldiers, corrupted by the anti-Semitic propaganda of the Government, and the scum of the Polish town population are taking part. The Jews are being mercilessly beaten and robbed of their property. Even such a town as Lodz, the "Russian Manchester," with a population of half a million, witnessed a terrible anti-Jewish "pogrom" which lasted many days while the Russian authorities were still in possession of the town. One is obliged to say that the Jews in Poland are literally placed outside the law.

"Pogroms"

The monstrosity of this "pogrom" campaign at a time when the country is engaged in war with a foreign enemy is surprising, even though the autocracy does enjoy the fully deserved reputation of being the most barbarous despotism in the world. The military authorities, however, were not satisfied with the traditional "pogroms" consecrated by the practice of the Russian Government; they have contributed their own share to the arsenal of arms against the Jew. They have applied a new infernal weapon borrowed from the medieval ages: the expulsion of the entire Jewish population from a whole series of localities.

The procedure of the expulsions recalls the depth of past ages and brings back to life pictures of medieval barbarism: at the sound of drums the whole Jewish population of a given locality is gathered together and the order to leave the town issued by the military authorities is read to it. There is no appeal from this order. The time-limit is 24 hours, and in some places not more than three hours. Those who are found in town after the expiration of the time-limit are to be court-martialed.

"Expelled"

The "exodus" of the Jews bears all the marks of the medieval wanderings: thousands of people, men and women, the healthy and the sick, decrepit old folks and little children, plod for days and weeks, although the distance which divides them from Warsaw, the only city where they may find shelter, is comparatively not great. The exiles undergo incredible suffering, insults, and injury. Cases of premature births on the road and cases of deaths of children are not infrequent. The panic among the hapless hordes of wanderers is so great that mothers often discover to their greatest terror that instead of their babies they carry in their arms only empty pillows; the babies have slipped out of the pillows unnoticed and are lost on the road.

The property of the exiled, which is all left behind, is immediately pounced upon by the soldiers and the local hooligans. Not only shops, but even private dwellings are gutted. Such are the horrors suffered by the exiled.

Jews have been expelled from Grodsisk, Skrenevitz, Sochatzoff, Lowitch, Gura-Kalvary, Nova-Alexandria, Kosenitz, Ivangorod, and from many other places. There are already over 100,000 Jewish refugees in Warsaw.

Malice and Hypocrisy

Finally, Jews are, on the slightest pretext, delivered to the field courts-martial, on whose verdict they are either hanged, deported, or sentenced to penal servitude; and when even the "Justitia" of the field courts-martial is unable to find a shadow of proof against them, they are subjected to corporal punishment and sent out of the town for the duration of the war.

We need not speak of the fury and frenzy of the Cossacks. To kill a Jew, or at least to rob him, is considered sport, in which a Cossack indulges with impunity.

In order to justify all these outrages which recall the dark medieval ages, the Russian Government has coined a new false accusation, viz., that the Jews are supporting the Germans, a falsehood worthy of the originators of the Beilis trial and who are still at the helm of the Government.

The hypocrisy of the Russian Government is astounding. It sent to the front at least a quarter of a million Jewish soldiers. It decorates Jewish soldiers with orders for valour. The Conservative Press, the devoted servant of the Government, commends the patriotic manifestations of the Jews, such as the Jewish demonstrations, the subscriptions to various funds for the wounded, for the families of the soldiers, the numerous cases of voluntary enrollment in the army, etc., etc. The Tsar has received Jewish deputations in many towns and thanked the Jews for their "love and loyalty." And at the same time the same Government, with the help of the Press at its bidding, and with the help of the policy adopted by the military authorities as described above, is attempting to suggest to the Russian people that the Jews are traitors to the country. Could one invent a more infernal gamble in which the honour, the life, and the property of millions of people are at stake?

The object of the Government is clear. The legend of Jewish "treachery," spread among the masses at a moment when passions are roused to the highest pitch in connection with the struggle against the foreign enemy, will prove more successful than the ritual accusation. The legend will sow seeds of hatred of the Jews among the greatest masses of the Russian population. It will serve in the hands of the Government in case of necessity, which may arise yet while the war is on, as a new means of diverting the anger of the people from Tsardom towards the Jews.

CZAR NICHOLAS II CLAIM OF SLAVIC ORIGIN A FRAUD.

(Translated from Allgemeine Zeitung des Judentums.)

There are innumerable cases on record to prove, that as a rule the apostates and renegades become the worst enemies and traducers of the people or the religion they have deserted. In all cases they at least assume that character in order to gain the favor and the confidence of their new associates.

Who is now masquerading as the most ardent German hater, as the "true Russian," the leader of his "slavic brothers," whom he desires to free from the foreign tyrrany, in order to himself oppress and enslave them? Who other than the little father, the Czar, the "autocrat of all Russians?"

From this very fact alone it might be deduced, that the present rulers of Russia are apostates from another nationality and, that their zeal on behalf of the Slavs is mere sham and a falsefaced lie. However, we need not depend on mere logical deductions as there are ample historical and genealogical authorities to furnish the proof, that the most expert scientist could not find more than a trace of slavic blood in the veins of the now reigning Czar, even with the aid of the sharpest of microscopes.

More than one thousand years ago the Russians had to depend upon North-Germanic heroes as rulers in order to secure a somewhat stable form of government. Czar Iwan III (+ 1584) in the course of a conversation with an Englishman denounced the Russians as liars and imposters and when the Englishman —having better judgment than George V and his ministry—replied to the Czar, that being a Russian himself he should not make that statement, the Czar claimed to be of Norman nationality and descent.

It is rather doubtful whether that Czar and his progenitors, who during two centuries had been vassals of the Tartar rulers and who kowtowed before the Grand Khan when delivering the annual tribute, really are the descendants of the Norman Rurik. At the same time such might be believed to be the case when we remember the words of the great English speaker, Edmund Burke, that so adaptly characterized the Russian rulers. He said: "They served their apprenticeship under tyrrany in order to acquire mastership therein."

At the time when these Russian Grand Dukes kowtowed in slavish devotion before the Grand Khan, his wives and officials, in order to secure an additional piece of land or obtain some desired title, the house of Habsburg already wore the crown of the German Empire and now one of the ministers of the Czar dares to speak of the "impudence of Austria."

Admitting even, that young Michail, who after a series of long civil wars and of warfare with the Poles in which he never participated, as the first born of the Bojar family Roman Sacharinitsch secured the Russian throne through the shrewdness of his father, the Bishop Feodor, and the superstition of the Russian people, had been a Slav, the proportion of Slavic or Russian blood flowing in the veins of his progeny has constanly diminished. His immediate successors married Russian women. Peter the Great, after repudiating his first wife, Eudoxia Lopuchin, married the Swedish or Finish Katharina of Marienburg of no too savory reputation who bore hi two daughters, Anna and Elizabe Thus these daughters only were of ha Russian blood. Anna who died in 172 had married Count Frederic of Holstei Gottorp, and was succeeded by her so Czar Peter III, who thus could onl claim one quarter of Russian bloo His wife, the notorious Katharina II o many amorous connections, had been Princess of Anhalt-Zerbst and she b came the mother of Paul I (provide he was a legitimate son), who thus coul only boast of one-eighth of Russia blood. Paul also married a German Princess Dorothea Auguste of Wuertem berg; his sons Alexander I and Nichola I thus were only one-sixteenth Russia and fifteen-sixteenths German. Nichola I married Princess Charlotte of Prussia hence his son, Alexander II, had onl one-thirty-second Russian blood and a this last named Czar wedded a Princes of Hessen-Darmstadt the slavic elemen in the physical makeup of the thir Alexander is thus reduced to one-sixty-fourth. The now ruling Czar, the son o a Danish Princess, has still less of Russian or Slavish blood in his veins and the proportion thereof is less than one per cent.

It is but natural, that among the "Genuine Russians" much has been preserved from the earlier Romanoff period, which had been suppressed by the reforms of Peter, but which now again comes to the surface from the hidden depths. Napoleon I used to say: "Scratch a Russian and you will find the Tartar." The Popes have repeatedly preached and instigated pogroms, persecution and robbery of strangers and dissenters and the mob was not slow, when thus officially encouraged, to carry these cruelties into execution. Peter the Great had inhibited these excesses and hence he was not beloved in his days and is not a popular hero now. Nicholas II, in order to retain popularity with the mob and to maintain himself upon the throne claims to be a full-blooded Russian.

ANNUAL MEETING OF AMERICAN JEWISH HISTORICAL SOCIETY

The 23d annual meeting of the American Jewish Historical Society was held in New York City on Feb. 21, 1915, at the Hotel McAlpine. President Cyrus Adler delivered a brief address of welcome to the assembled delegates.

The first paper presented was that by Albert M. Friedenberg, dealing with an early letter of the Judah family of New York and Canada and with a mass of unpublished mercantile correspondence of Aaron Lopez, prominent merchant of colonial Newport.

The paper by Rabbi Isaac E. Marcuson of Charleston was read by Prof. Gottheil. It described the gifts of Ricardo in 1762 and De Lieben in 1802 to the local Portuguese synagogue.

Joshua Block of New York gave the history of the Hebrew periodical press in America, and Samuel Oppenheim presented letters of Solomon Bush, a Pennsylvania soldier in the American Revolution.

During the afternoon session Dr. Cyrus Adler presented his paper on items of Jewish interest in the correspondence of J. Jordan Crittenden and Daniel Gomez, a pioneer merchant of early New York.

Two interesting papers were read by Dr. Jos. Jacobs, first, a Description of Jewish Commerce in the Ninth Century, and second, the Mediaeval Status of the Jews. Dr. Max L. Margolis of Philadelphia offered a study of a Greek-Syrian Jew mentioned in a papyrus of the first century.

Dr. J. J. Price of Toronto, Canada, communicated a number of discoveries of Jewish interest from the Dominion archives.

The Sunday evening sessions were opened by Mr. L. M. Friedman of Boston, who read a paper on the phylacteries found at Pittsfield, Mass. Dr. A. A. Newman of Philadelphia presented a study of the economic condition of the Jews of Spain. The Sunday evening meeting was brought to a close by the paper of Dr. J. F. Sachse of Philadelphia, which proved that Moses Michael Hays of Boston was instrumental in bringing the Masonic degrees into America.

Concluding sessions were held on Monday morning. Mr. B. H. Hartogensis of Baltimore read an account of the Sephardic congregation of Baltimore. Rabbi Martin Zielonka of El Paso recounted the details of an American-Spanish-Jewish periodical. Many other papers were also presented.

Reports of the officers were found gratifying. The officers were unanimously re-elected and the meeting adjourned.

THE KEHILLAH

XV.

BY PROF. GOTTHARD DEUTSCH, Ph.D.

Having enlarged my original scope so as to speak not merely of conditions I have seen or which those whom I knew personally had been able to observe, I turn to one of the most prominent rabbis that officiated in Nickolsburg, a man as interesting by his personal experiences, as he has become popular by his main work. I refer to Yomtov Pippman Heller, who was born at Wallerstein in Bavaria in 1579, and died as rabbi of Cracow in 1654. These dry biographical data give us at once an idea of the migrations of the Jews, and the uncertainty of the aristocratic claims which consider the Jews of Lower Frankonia the salt of Israel, and those of Poland the descendents of that mixed multitude, who made already trouble for Israel in the wilderness.

Lipman Heller was a posthumous son, and was raised by his grandfather Moses, who was the rabbi of Wallerstein. This place is also one of the Kehillas which lost their glory completely: Like so many congregations in that section of the country, its earliest settlers were undoubtedly people expelled from one of the free cities that got rid of their Jews in the fifteenth century, compelling the latter to look for more favorable conditions elsewhere. They may have come from Noerdlingen which expelled her Jews in the beginning of the 16th century, or from Augsburg which expelled the Jews at an earlier date, and found protection through the kindness of the counts of Oettingen, the lords of manor at Wallerstein. After centuries of active intellectual life, the congregation lost its place as a spiritual center, and the last rabbi, David S. Weisskopf, moved to Kleinerdlingen in 1876. He died in 1882, and the rabbinate of his district was united with that of Ichenhausen. Wallerstein has today not more than seven members, representing thirty-seven souls. According to the practices of olden times, young Lipman was sent away from home. to study at the famous Yeshibah of Friedberg in Hessen. Friedberg is another town which lives on its history. Though still a city of nearly 10,000 people, with a congregation of 500 souls, it forms part of the district of Giessen, while up to the beginning of the 19th century it was a famous center of learning. so that in the beginning of the 18th century in an antisemitic movement this Yeshibah was denounced as the center of hostility to Christianity.

A Jew of our days, living in some city of the west, would, when he wishes to give his son an education, make him take a graduate course at Yale or Harvard. after he has completed his studies at a local university. So, in the 16th and 17th centuries, the ancestor of our contemporary, would send his son to one of the most prominent Yeshibas, and so Lipman Heller was sent at an early age to Prague. There he sat at the feet of the most famous rabbi of those days, Loewe Ben Bezalel, of whom I spoke in my last sketch. Having married at an early age, as was customary in those days when the Talmudic rule to marry at eighteen was as strictly respected as is now among the Orthodox the rule that at thirteen a boy should be made to lay his Tefillin, Lipman Heller became a member of the rabbinate of Prague, a Dayan. The duties of that office were more important in those days than they are now in Orthodox communities. He was a member of the local court that had to pass on questions of civil law in the case of all Jews in the community, and, in such a central city of learning as Prague, also on cases that were brought to them from the small cities in the country. In addition he also had to pass on questions of the ritual law, as the chief rabbi could not possibly give attention to all complications that arose in the kitchen of every household. Having thus earned his spurs, Lipman Heller was in 1624 called as rabbi to Nickolsburg. He had then already made a lasting reputation in rabbinic literature by writing his commentary on the Mishna, whose popularity is attested to by Heine when he says in his "disputation":

"Gilt Nichts mehr der Tausves-Jontof,
Was soll gelten? Zeter! Zeter!
Raeche, Herr, die Missethat,
Strafe, Herr, den Uebelthaeter!
Denn der Tausves-Jontof, Gott,
Das bist du! Und an dem frechen
Tausves-Jontof-Luegner muszt Du
Deines Namens Ehre raechen."

Heine was guilty of an anachronism, for the disputation that he describes took place in Barcelona in 1264, more than 300 years before Lipman Heller's commentary was written. His words, however, are a testimony to the popularity of the work, and to the high esteem in which it was held. Lipman Heller remained in Nickolsburg only one year, when he was called to Vienna. After a short time he received the call to Prague, then probably the most important Jewish congregation of Germany. He succeeded Isaiah Horowitz, who, actuated by religious enthusiasm, left the rabbinate to go to Palestine, where he spent the remainder of his days. Bohemia was then in the throes of the thirty years' war, the beginning of which Horowitz saw in Prague when the congregation trembled at the apprehension of the terrible vengeance which the Imperial troops might wreak on it after the battle of the White Mountains, November 20, 1620. The matter turned out better than was expected, for the attention of the victor was completely absorbed by the desire to crush Protestantism. Most likely the Jews felt, as was always the case in times of a crisis, that the Messiah was coming, and Horowitz prepared to greet him in Palestine. Lipman Heller was of a more prosaic nature, though in accordance with the views of his time, he was also a believer in the mystic doctrines of Cabbala.

In Prague he became the victim of an intrigue, which came near costing his life. He was denounced to the government as an enemy to Christianity, and was taken to Vienna for trial. The matter requires some explanatory remarks. The government in those days taxed the Jews as a body. It was to the interest of the government that the Jews should assess themselves. Therefore a tax was imposed on the community as a whole and it was the business of the community to distribute it and to collect it, and this was all the government cared for. To the rabbi belonged a very prominent share in this practice of taxation. He had to assemble the trustees and make them swear that they would be just and he also had to watch over the formula of oath which every individual taxpayer had to take before he made his affidavit. Naturally, as is now the case, individuals as well as classes claimed that they were discriminated against, and in many instances this may have been true. In the case that we are speaking of in Prague. someone wrote to the government that the rabbi was favoring the rich, and working against the interest of the poor, placing the burden of taxation on the masses, and sparing the wealthy. This was not true. We are treated all the time to the very same charge that taxation, whether in the form of custom duty, or income tax or whether in the way of excise taxes is making those who are wealthy wealthier, and is robbing the poor. Just exactly these charges were made against Lipman Heller. The government ordered an investigation and found that there was no basis to the claim, and the case was dismissed. The man who had brought these charges originally, went farther, determined not to be defeated and to get even with the rabbi, and he wrote a letter to the government, saying that the rabbi had lectured and in a book had spoken disrespectfully of Christianity and especially of the Holy Virgin. The latter was a very severe charge in those days. Only a few years ago the imperial troops had compensated and re-established not merely the imperial authority, but also the rule of Roman Catholicism. Protestants were mercilessly persecuted and the real masters of the situation, the Jesuits, tried in their clever way to win the masses by an appeal to their imagination and their emotion, and one of their methods was the propagation of the cult of the Holy Virgin. To say in those days that the rabbi had blasphemed the Holy Virgin meant sure death. The Jesuits were only too glad to avail themselves of such an occasion, for it placed them in the limelight as the center of the Holy Catholic faith and it gave them the power over the public because the latter loves the excitement of an execution just as our people love to read about sensational crimes today. The rabbi was to be brought in chains to Vienna and only owing to the great efforts of his friends the order was changed to a milder one that he had to appear for trial. This condition was quite serious, but owing to the efforts of his friends it was possible that the case was dismissed, but in spite of this he was exiled and disqualified from ever holding a rabbinical office in the country. He left Austria and went to Poland, the haven of refuge for persecuted Jews, where he died as rabbi of Cracow in 1654.

The trouble of the informers is an old plague spot on the Jewish body politic. We find reference to it in old rabbinic literature. In the Midrash (Genesis, Raba 21), God asks the nations of the earth, "Why did you so mercilessly persecute my children?" They answered they deserved it because there were so many informers amongst them. Another Midrash says that the Israelites were delivered from Egypt through four virtues, amongst them is that they guarded their secrets. (Buber's notes on Midrash Tehillim, p. 472, Wilna 1891.) This virtue, however, was by no means general. Old records of congregations, as well as rabbinic literature are full of proofs that practice did not follow the theory. The constitution of Cracow, issued in 1595, contains severe penalties for informers. One case in Frankfurt, in the early part of the 17th century deserves more than passing notice. German rabbis held, in 1603, a meeting in Frankfurt, in which resolutions on various congregational questions were passed, as enforcing the observance of ritual laws, like the prohibition of wine made by non-Jews. Other resolutions tending to an improvement of education, and finally one condemning the habit of Jews to carry their internal affairs to the courts, were passed. In the peculiar style of rabbinic Hebrew it was said that this practice was a scandal (Hillul Hashem). An informer by the name of Kraus, called Kraeusche, brought the matter before the imperial authorities, and claimed on the ground of a literal translation that the rabbis had declared that a sentence, rendered by the imperial court was a profanation of the name of God. This was indeed a serious matter in those days especially as the emperor, Rudolph II who resided at Prague, and of whom mention was made in cnnection with the audience which he granted to the "tall Rabbi Loew" in my previous article, was a very queer character, who secluded himself in his study brooding over mystic problems and leaving the government largely in the hands of his chamberlain, a converted Jew named Philip Lang. Fasting, special services, and liberal bribes averted the calamity. This terrible habit was not confined to the German Jews, degenerated by their Ghetto habits, but is evidently found among the cultured and more manly Jews of Spanish descent. In the records of the Portuguese congregation of Hamburg, we find under the date of 1643, an entry that Moses Henriques was found guilty of "Malsinaria" (derived from the Hebrew "malshin"—informer) and was excommunicated for ten days. Under conditions, which, if anything, should tend to solidarity, we find the same trouble. In 1671, fifty Jewish families, of those exiled from Vienna, found a refuge in Berlin under very restrictive conditions. One should imagine that the small band should stand together in preserving their always precarious privileges, but this was not the case. One Bendix Loewe charged the Jews of Berlin with secret violation of the laws, and obtained his object, being appointed official informer in 1684. How this lack of solidarity reacted on the Jews can be seen from a decision rendered by the imperial cabinet of Vienna in 1786. Some Jews of Lemberg brought charges against the trustees and the rabbis for misappropriation of the public funds, and—the latter is especially amusing—against the rabbi as being irreligious. The cabinet did not act on this information, but in a report to the emperor cites the petition as proof that the Jews can not be redeemed. Emperor Joseph in his kindness, rules that nevertheless the authorities must continue in their efforts to raise the status of the Jews. Peter Beer teacher at a Jewish school in Prague, in a petition which be addressed to the war department in 1815, wishes that a clear statement be made to the effect that a Jew may be appointed as officer in the army. He claims that he was actuated by the difficulty which he experienced when he tried to inculcate patriotism into the youth placed in his care, and he hopes that by such a declaration the aversion of the Jews to military service, and their general habit to evade all the laws of the state would be overcome. This letter was written at a time when the congress of Vienna was discussing the plans to put the Jews back to the status which they had held previous to the French Revolution. More like the case of Lipman Heller is that of Rabbi Eleazar Fleckeles of Prague, who was accused in an anoymous letter directed to the government that his book of sermons, Olat Zibbur, published in 1787, contained anti-dynastic views. He was actually arrested, although soon liberated. In 1849, when after the crushing defeat of the revolutionary party, the Jews of Vienna were singled out as a moving factor in the revolution and the eccentric, though innocent journalist, Herman Jellinek, the brother of the famous preacher was executed for the evident purpose of presenting the revolution as a Jewish movement, the Hazan of the Polish synagogue in Vienna, informed the authorities that in the synagogue politics were discussed in a manner favorable to the revolution, and that he was discharged because he objected to this disloyal and irreligious act. He obtained his end, for the government insisted that he be retained, and at the same time issued an order, demanding the supervision of the synagogue. A case of the same kind in which the minister is the victim, is reported in 1860 from the reactionary state of Hesse-Cassel. The teacher in Bockenheim, had delivered a sermon on Psalms 146, 3: "Put not your trust in princes," and a member of the congregation who wanted him removed, which was difficult under the law of Hesse-Cassel, informed the authorities that the minister had preached high treason. In 1863, while the Jews of Prussia worked for the removal of the antiquated oath which by its existence, cast a reflection on the veracity of the Jews, a teacher in Lebsenz, Posen, said in order to disqualify Jewish witnesses in the court, who appeared against him, that the Jews have a "Hetter" or subterfuge, by which they may perjure themselves in court. In Mecklenburg-Strelitz, one of the reactionary German states, which maintained some of the disabilities of the Jews, including the Leibzoll, until 1869, the Land-rabbiner Reichmann accused his congregation of persecution, because he was a conservative, while the congregation consisted of "democrats." The Orthodox in Berlin, working for the recognition of their autonomy, claimed as a reason for their demand that they were conservatives, while their opponents, the liberal majority of the congregation, were working towards the destruction of everything positive in religion and politics. Seven years after the terrible shock which the civilized world experienced at the news of the massacre of Kishineff, and only five years after the pogroms which were claimed to have been caused by the revolutionary tendencies of the Jews, a veteran of Kishineff wrote to the governor that the Jewish charity organizations refused him assistance because he was a loyal servant of the Czar, and they only assisted deserters and those who go to America to dodge military service. It is an unpleasant chapter in Jewish history, and though my material is by no means exhausted, I prefer to end the enumeration of these instances.

Lipman Heller was a victim of this terrible habit, found so frequently among the oppressed. Poland was then the land of promise, where Jews persecuted elsewhere, could find a haven of refuge, not that they were safe there, but there was at least no systematic and legal persecution, and it seemed that the Jews feared less the outbreak of occasional mob violence than the constant oppression by law. We have, however, of him one interesting document dated from the earliest times of his residence in Prague. It is a letter addressed to a relative in Vienna, and the matter itself is so interesting that it is worth while giving the story in the connection. By a mere accident, a few years ago, a batch of letters partly written in Hebrew, partly in Yiddish, were discovered in Vienna. They had a rather interesting history. In November, 1619, on a Friday, somebody must have gone from Prague to Vienna, and the ghetto was busy writing letters, to avail itself of this opportunity. Mail service, was in those days, restricted to such ocasional opportunities especially in 1619, when Bohemia was in a state of rebellion, having elected a king of her own, and having declared the emperor as deposed, connection between Prague and Austria was difficult. The messenger who carried the letters, was evidently

By S. N. Deinard

(Conclusion)

"Christian Science acknowledges the Divinity of Christ and the Incarnation, as the following passage shows: 'The Christ was the Spirit which Jesus implied in his own statements: "I am the way, the truth, and the life;" "I and my father are one.' "This Christ, or divinity of the man Jesus, was his divine nature, the godliness which animated him. Divine Truth, Life, and Love, gave Jesus authority over sin, sickness, and death. His mission was to reveal the science of celestial being, to prove what God is and what He does for man.' Sc. and H. p. 26.)"

The same authority continues: "Christian Science teaches that the Atonement was the life-work of Jesus, whereby He proved, step by step, man's unity with God, by conquering all materiality and sin. It regards the crucifixion on Calvary as the last and greatest temptation to believe in the power of evil with which He was confronted; it teaches that He overcame this temptation at His resurrection, thus proving that death itself is mastered by the right understanding of eternal Life; and that the Ascension was the crowning act of redemption, whereby the spiritual nature of man was fully revealed, and the atonement, or at-one-ment, with the Father was demonstrated."

Another authority on Christian Science, a former co-religionist of ours, but now a Christian Science reader, healer, and member of the Christian Science Committee on Publication, in a communication to a weekly paper writes: "The Christian Science organization . . . insists upon the whole garment of Christ instead of merely part thereof. In other words, it not only follows the Master's command to preach the gospel,' but also to 'heal the sick.' . . . The main function of Christian Science is to restore primitive Christianity and regenerate humanity, and experience has demonstrated that the healing of sin and sickness go hand in hand. 'Jesus healed sin and sickness by one and the same metaphysical process.' (Sc. and H. p. 210.)"

Another authority, a lecturer of the Christian Science Church of Boston, in a public lecture used these words: "We worship one God, the God of Moses, and all the prophets, and we accept his son Christ Jesus, as the only Christ and way-shower. The law was given by Moses, but grace and truth came by Jesus Christ."

And still another authority who stands high in the councils of Christian Science, Alfred Farlow, writes: "This Science teaches that Jesus' death on the cross manifested his infinite love for mankind and illustrated the ideal manhood, while his resurrection proved that he was deathless, that his life was not in matter, that he could not be confined within the tomb, realizing as he did that God, Spirit, is the only real life. . . . The atonement of our Lord may be properly called vicarious, since it was a pure sacrifice for mankind. . . . His death and resurrection as well as his ascension, were needed to illustrate certain facts concerning the science of being which were necessary to be understood and practiced by mortals in the fulfilment of the scriptural demand, 'Work out your own salvation with fear and trembling'"

In commenting on this last quotation, Rabbi David Philipson writes: "Here we have the whole orthodox Christian theology accepted as the teaching of Christian Science. The doctrine of the vicarious atonement accomplished by the death of God's only begotten son on the cross whereby he took upon himself the sins of all mankind, and by his blood brought salvation to all who believe in him as the Son of God; the doctrine, too, of the resurrection, whereby he emerged from the confines of the tomb and bodily arose to take his place beside the Father in Heaven."

Such statements on the part of leaders of the cult could be multiplied; but I refrain from doing it for lack of space. I cannot resist the temptation, however, to quote one more passage from another Christian Science authority, Clarence W. Chadwick: "There are no people on earth who feel and express more genuine affection and love for Jesus Christ than do Christian Scientists. They not only believe, but they understand why he is to them the resurrection and the life. They reverently acknowledge him as the Savior of the world, and they are striving to keep his commandments."

Hence it is quite comprehensible why it is logical and natural for any Christian to join the new cult. He finds in it a somewhat more consistent form of Gospel Christianity, more consistent in one regard, healing—to him a matter of great and pressing importance. Compared to this real or imaginary service, what have other Christian churches, except the Catholic, to offer nowadays? I except the Catholic because it offers escape from purgatory and perdition. But how can a Jew accept these purely Christian ideas and doctrines, ideas and doctrines so antagonistic to his religion; ideas and doctrines against which he has protested these nineteen hundred years, and whenever called upon, sealed his protest with his life's blood?

Yes, Christian Science is Christian. Whether it is science, men of science should be best qualified to judge. It might be well to get the opinions of the world's great scientists, real scientists, physicists and chemists, biologists, physiologists, and psychologists, mathematicians and astronomers, the great inventors, explorers and discoverers; the Bells, the Edisons, the Wrights, the Maxims, and the Marconis; the Teslas, the Roentgens, and the Michelsons; the Mendeleeffs, the Ostwalds, and the Curies; the Metchinkoffs, the Loebs, the Flexners, and the Ehrlichs; the host of men of science who teach at our universities, and toil in their laboratories and clinics, whose discoveries and inventions constitute the greatest triumph of the modern age—I say it might be well to get their opinions as to the scientific value of Christian Science. So far we have not heard of a single one of the world's real scientists who has turned Christian Scientist. Strange that those men who are scientists by profession, who devote their lives to the pursuit of science, should have so little sense for the only true science discovered by Mrs. Eddy! Strange!

Can a Jew Be a Christian Scientist and a Jew at the Same Time?

If it were merely a matter of hugging a few superstitions and delusions, even though they run counter to the purest elements of his own religion, a Jew could embrace them and still remain a Jew. The common run of Jews, like all human beings, have not been, and are not now, free from superstition. There have been Jews who believed in spirits, good and evil, the evil eye, witchcraft, amulets, the efficacy of changing the name in case of sickness; who believed in wonder-rabbis and their miraculous cures, effected by the laying on of hands, or the repetition of mystic formulas, or the performance of Cabalistic jugglery; who believed in every kind of mysticism. Yet they all remained Jews, and often outgrew those superstitions. There are Jews now who believe in unlucky numbers, unlucky days, etc. Still they are Jews. But he who joins the new cult of Christian Science ceases to be a Jew. He gradually sunders all connections with the Jewish people, shuns the synagogue, and joins the church. This we know from experience.

Christian Scientists who first get hold of a Jew and try to benefit him by their ministration of healing, don't hesitate to tell him that he need not abandon his Judaism in order to receive the blessings of Christian Science; that the two are quite compatible, nay, that Christian Science will only strengthen his Judaism, and make a better Jew of him. This is the one unpardonable act of Christian Scientists in their relations with the Jew. They obtain the Jew under false pretenses. For gradually, as he begins to frequent their meetings, and rejoices over his regained health, and newly-found happiness, and his heart overflows with gratitude for the great good the new religion has apparently done him; and as he is attracted by the friendliness and warm cordiality with which, like all eager conversionists, the Christian Scientists receive their neophytes, he decides that he may as well be more fully identified with this body of good men and women, all so loyal, so zealous, so peaceful, and so happy.

They have all along given him to understand that there is nothing in Christian Science that can be objectionable to a Jew; that there is nothing of the old orthodox Christian ideas in it—no Trinity, no belief in Jesus as the Son of God, etc. This, of course, is hypocrisy and deception. For, as everyone may see from the various Christian Science statements and declarations cited above, Christian Science is thoroughly Christian, in so far as it has incorporated into its scheme every element of Christian theology, no matter what fantastic interpretation it may give them. The Christ, the Redeemer, the Atonement, the Resurrection, etc., etc., are all ideas entirely strange and repugnant to the Jew. They are all based on New Testament teaching against which the Jew has protested ever since the New Testament made its appearance.

They are ideas which, thank God, the present enlightened age is rapidly outgrowing. One true science, the science of comparative mythology, has in recent years given them their death-blow. It shows conclusively that all such ideas are Christianity's heritage from the pagan religions that preceded it, and that contributed to its formation; the religions of the Hindoos, the Egyptians, the Babylonians, the Persians, the Phoenicians, the Greeks and the Romans. They all had their sons of god, their christs, their redeemers, slain and resurrected, their mothers of God, and their trinities or triads. Anyone interested in the subject, and desirous of knowing the truth, will find it illuminatingly discussed in hundreds of books written by earnest-minded and learned scholars and truth-seekers, all men of Christian antecedents.

But the Jew who has once been caught in the Christian Science net is ready to swallow almost anything. He is at last won over completely, is anxious to join the church, when, of course, he is told that he must give up membership in his former religious society, which he does. A member of the Christian Science church must resign from all his former religious associations.

Thus the Christian Science Jew abandons his ancestral faith and his people. He should be considered by us as much a "meshummad" as the Jew who joins any other Christian church, no matter what his reason or motive.

Are Jews Actuated by Some Other Motive to Join the Christian Science Church?

This (essay) was originally intended for those Jews who are lured to the Christian Science faith by its promise to cure them of their bodily ailments. Such Jews may be foolish, unreasoning, superstitious, but they are honest. The saying is that a drowning man will clutch at a straw to save himself. What will not a man do to be healed, to be saved from pain and suffering, to have his health restored? He will try Christian Science, just as he will try every quack and charlatan who offers and promises a cure; just as he will try every patent medicine and nostrum. It is to such people that I am trying to point out the foolishness of it all, the baselessness of the claim that Christian Science has any power of healing outside of the very natural means of freedom from care, anxiety, and fear, abstention from drugs, and suggestion or hypnosis. It is such people that I am trying to prevent from being gradually drawn away from their people and their ancestral faith and into the Christian fold.

But further observation and thought have convinced me that some Jews turn Christian Scientists from other motives, motives unworthy, unmanly, because extremely selfish. Some Jews join the new cult because they wish to get away from Jews and Judaism. They find it an easy and convenient way, one that is not so offensive to their relatives, friends, and former Jewish associates, because of the deceptive argument often heard that one can be a Jew and a Christian Scientist at the same time. It is thus they reason with their surprised and questioning friends at first. Gradually, however, they throw off the mask, and as we know, part company with their former co-religionists, except when they see an opportunity of fishing in troubled waters, of winning the soul of another Jew to the Christian Science church.

From the selfish and material point of view, Judaism is still a great inconvenience, an obstacle in the path of one's ambition to succeed in the world. To be a Jew means to be more or less hampered in life's race, means to start out with a handicap. True, times have considerably changed and improved in the last hundred years. We are no longer called upon to suffer martydom for our faith, except in semi-barbarous countries like Russia. We are no longer butchered and tortured by Inquisitions, and infuriated mobs, or exiled by fanatic and despotic rulers, or despoiled by greedy and unscrupulous kings and nobles.

But the old-time prejudice against the very name Jew still lingers even in the freest lands and among the most enlightened nations. This prejudice crystalizes itself in customs, practices, unwritten laws, that bar the road, or strew it with obstacles, for every gifted, and ambitious Jew. In Germany and Austria many honorable careers are closed to a Jew because he is a Jew. And even in those countries in which a more developed sense of justice precludes such practices, or at least openly disavows and discountenances them, the prejudice that exists in certain elements and classes of the population still deprives the Jew of many a chance of success, which a non-Jew, though not better equipped, can easily win. At best, the prejudice shows itself in social discrimination and snobbery, which to a socially ambitious and sensitive Jew is just as offensive as any other kind of hostility. Many a fashionable hotel, or pleasure resort, or club, has no accommodations for Jews, caters to no Jewish patronage, desires no Jewish membership.

Time was when the Jew was so faithful, so loyal to his own, so thoroughly convinced of the superiority of his own faith, his own law and life, that such little deprivations and inconveniences, such offenses and injuries, were as nothing to him. He bore them stoically, unconcernedly. He was used to greater sacrifices, greater hardships, greater pains "for the sanctification of the divine name."

But times have changed, both for better and for worse. On the one hand, conditions are much better for the Jew in most lands. At least his rights to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness are fully recognized and protected. On the other hand, people are so ambitious, so aggressive, so eager to forge ahead, to win all of life's prizes, that neither faith, nor conviction, nor loyalty, nor any other great virtue is allowed to bar one's way to success. Success, worldly, material, success, is the Moloch that all worship, the modern Jew included.

No wonder that in Germany, Austria, England, France and other European countries thousands of Jews have parted company with their fellow Jews and Judaism, and have become merged and lost in the vast non-Jewish majority. Some have joined the mass of the unchurched; they are "Konfessionslos," as they call themselves in Germany; while others have entered the fold of Christianity. Thousands of Jewish recruits are annually added to the Christian church in Germany and Austria. Many others, who still have a spark of honest manhood in them, and cannot enter the portals of the church with a lie on their lips, have their children raised as Christians, in order, as they think, to give them a free and open road to future success. Thus are manhood, honesty, conviction, loyalty and faith sacrificed nowadays on the altar of vanity, ambition and greed. Such Jews we have in this country, too, and a goodly number of them. To them Judaism, to use Heine's phrase, is a misfortune. They would fain be relieved from it. To such the Christian Science Church is a veritable godsend. They try to deceive their former coreligionists by telling them that Christian Science is not Christian at all. It is something different. "One can remain a Jew at the same time, yea even a better Jew," they tell you, and a lot more of such hypocritical nonsense.

For such Jews this (essay) is not intended. It is useless to argue with them. It is not worth our while.

Another Reason Given by Jewish Christian Scientists.

There are also those who are attracted to the Christian Science Church by the cordiality and warmth of its social atmosphere, the "glad hand" that is offered them when they come and go, the friendliness of the members to every newcomer, at least within the church edifice. To the Jewish recruit this is a most welcome experience. He contrasts it with the somewhat cold atmosphere that prevails in the modern synagogue, the indifference of the older members to newcomers.

He does not realize that the Christian churches, is eager to make converts, that a Jew in particular is considered by them a great gain, a valuable acquisition. Hence the policy of the ushers, deacons, elders and ministers of the Christian churches to heartily extend the right hand of fellowship to everyone

Is There Anti-Semitism in American Colleges?

Every year thousands of Jewish youths are entering the colleges and universities of America. Next year, perhaps, you or your son will be among those entrants. You will want, now, to choose your college, to find a place where Jewish boys have been welcomed, where they have been successful in sweeping down the prejudice and hostility of their fellows. You will want the assurance of the past history of Jewish students at certain of our educational institutions. You will want to know "what's what."

The Day has secured a series of articles, prepared by graduates and undergraduates of the more important of our Eastern colleges and universities, dealing with the "Jewish Question" at their respective Alma Maters. Beginning next week with a discussion of the attitude towards Jews at Yale, there will be, in each successive issue, a frank, fair-minded recital of the manner in which these representative seats of learning treat their Jewish students, and the opportunity they offer them to enjoy, unhindered and respected, the advantages of broad-minded study and helpful, kindly comradeship. These reports will, in some cases, be encouraging, in others they will be far from it—but they will be accurate, and will lay the blame where it belongs.

For blame ought often to be laid upon the Jewish boys themselves. Is it that they lack a certain something which should put them on an equal footing with the Gentile boys? Is it self-confidence they need? Or tact? Or gentility—or positive pride of race—or what? at any rate, why is it that they fail so signally, as a rule, to win a comfortable place for themselves in the college town? Is the fault their own?

Before attempting to answer ourselves we must know in just what branch of college life the Jewish boy falls behind his fellows. And "college life" is a hackneyed phrase which includes as many different sorts of activities and ambitions as the day has hours. It is not only a matter of books and classrooms. Some professors will tell you, in an overflow of honesty, that the curriculum is the least important part of college. They who have watched generation upon generation of flap-limbed freshmen enter college and leave it, at the end of four short, interested years, full grown and characterful men, are the first to claim that plenty of other things count for more than the routine of the classroom. The club life, the rubbing of shoulders and ideas with other boys, the athletic interests, the competitions for one or another undergraduate office—these are the things which make the college years such forceful builders of character, so memorable, so pleasant to look back upon in after years.

Now, it is an axiom that, in matters of study and of lexicons, you cannot improve upon the Jewish boy. He is almost always at the head of his class. His mind is nimble, and his spirit is indomitably eager for knowledge. He is master of the examination paper, and king of the lecture hall. But once outside—and he is deposed. He cannot seem to retain his leadership when the race deflects towards popularity, towards the art of making friends and winning cordiality.

In every American college the fraternities and secret societies play an important part. The social life of the institution is centered in these fraternities. It is a sad fact—and a puzzling one—that, excepting in rare cases, Jews are not elected into these fraternities at any college. Perhaps the fault lies in the blind stubbornness and priggishness of these societies—perhaps it lies elsewhere. Most of these fraternities profess to be thoroughly democratic, and to follow the high ideals of American fair play. But again, in some colleges, they will tell you openly of a firm and set discrimination against Jews being admitted into fraternities and clubs. In others they will complain that it is the Jewish boys themselves who are responsible for the coldness which is shown them. Youth is usually generous-hearted, makes friends easily, breaks through the lines of racial difference (if any there be!) with quick impetuosity. In answer to this, the Gentiles claim, they meet from their Jewish classmates an overbearing sense of superiority and cliquishness.

"Here's my complaint against the Jews at Brown," said a graduate of that university. "They are sickishly shy. They repel all advances of friendliness by dogged clannishness. They refuse to come out and play tennis with an Irishman from Texas or to talk pleasantly with a Yankee Baptist. Every college is a little community in itself. And communities make demands and ask sacrifices. The Jewish boys at Brown have never done much for the community. They seldom compete for the teams, the dramatic or musical clubs, or the college magazines. They are content either to make a thorough digesting of their text books or to indulge in noisy games of pool or pinochle. They fail to become very useful members of a gathering of young men, which is quick to demand that each of them do his share, and use his one or two or ten talents to the utmost of his industry. It makes no difference whether they are rich boys or poor. The Jewish poor boy at Brown has been a sullen, shame-faced type; the rich Jewish boy has usually been insulting and vulgar with his wealth."

You will see, there is no restraint in this statement. But it is worth nothing if it is not true. If it is true, it hits the crux of the problem.

It is an old adage that colleges give a just return for the love and labor of their sons. "You will get out of college all that you put into it," runs the saying which is printed in the little handbook distributed among all freshmen when they begin their undergraduate career. Admitting the truth that, as a general run, Jewish boys are not getting the most that they could get out of college, then you will have to ask yourself: "Are they putting into it all they could put? Are they giving the college they attend all the energy, the enthusiasm, the trust and love which they could afford to give it? Or, on the other hand, is the old adage incorrect when it comes to Jewish men? Are they being treated unfairly at this or that college?"

There is no better way to decide it than to have a freely detailed description of life in the various universities, and of the part which Jews are playing in that life. Such a series has been written for us by Jewish men who stood—or stand—high in the estimation of their classmates; who have had the opportunity of observing closely, and of formulating definite opinions and helpful suggestions.

In each of these articles the writer will ask himself: is anything wrong with the "Jewish Question" at my Alma Mater? If so, what—and why? Is the prejudice there so great that it has stamped out all chance for comfort and freedom? Or is it the deputation of Jewish boys themselves who are at fault?—[The Jewish Weekly.]

HEBREW SHELTERING AND IMMIGRANT AID SOCIETY.

The Hebrew Sheltering and Immigrant Aid Society of America will hold its annual meeting on Sunday, March 14th at 3 P. M., at Public School No. 62, Hester and Essex Streets, New York City. At this meeting Judge Leon Sanders, the President of the society, will report on the activities of the year and the following prominent and distinguished speakers will deliver addresses: Senator Reed of Missouri, Senator Martine of New Jersey, Anthony Caminetti, Commissioner-General of Immigration, Congressman J. Hampton Moore of Pennsylvania, Congressman Henry M. Goldfogle, Dr. Frederic C. Howe, Commissioner of Immigration at the port of New York, Mr. John B. Densmore, Solicitor-General of the Department of Labor, Hon. Abram I. Elkus, Hon. Joseph Barondess, Rev. Z. H. Masliansky. The serious situation of the Jews in Europe occasioned by the present war in Europe and its effect upon Jewish Immigration in this country will be among the topics considered at this meeting, one of the most important the Society has ever held.

All friends and members of the Society are cordially invited to attend. Admission cards may be obtained by applying at the office of the Society at 229 East Broadway, New York City.

PROFESSOR BALDWIN'S BOOK PLACED IN EIGHTY CITIES

"Our Modern Debt to Israel," a book written by Dr. E. C. Baldwin of the department of English, and published a year ago, has recently been placed in the public libraries of eighty cities and towns of this state. This distribution has been made by a Jewish organization, the I. O. B. B., with headquarters in Chicago.—The Daily Illini, Urbana, Ill.

REFUGEES

Sketches by Eduard Kaufmann

September is dying. It is a day on which I so strangely feel the autumn. I am not walking through gardens in which faded foliage reminds me of it, languishing meadows, fields bare of fruit do not call it to my mind. I am walking through the streets of the city, wearily, slowly. The wind is still. Now and then the sun slips through the clouds. But this very sun recalls such painful memories. It is fagged out, sad; as though it wishes to offer us comfort, but does not believe in its power. Like a sick person who lifts himself laboriously to an upright position and smilingly says: "Oh, no, I am not ill!" and sinks back.

I came from the low Hungarian plain, where a few days ago the sun still flamed, where I shouted with joy and exulted in it.

The sun is dying and shows me the fall.

I walk along the streams entangle myself in a mesh of sad thoughts. All brightness vanishes; I cannot lay hold on it.

I proceed, towards the mountains. Evening comes, the twilight; I would like to nestle close to it. I love it.

Something rushes by over the road. For a moment it looks glorified. I gaze attentively. A light trembles in the stream! It was kindled somewhere in the distance.

A second light flits into the water. Many others follow, unnumbered. The stream kindles all its lights. The little ones, the poor, the rich and the mighty; flaring tapers, flaming torches.

Where did I see something like them? I think and think—and suddenly I walk through the Ghettos of Moravia, Hungary, Galicia, where in the evening, when Sabbath comes, light near light flames up in the houses and throws a glimmer of fire shine across the streets.

It is Friday evening. I will go into the Jewish quarter! To the refugees from Galicia and Belgium. I want to be with them when the Sabbath comes!

In front of the house in the side street a great many people are standing. Men, women, children! I was here yesterday, also on many previous days. It is always the same as though I just left the place. Clothing, linen, shoes are being distributed here to the Jewish refugees. Hundreds, hundreds of them come daily and the supply in the magazines is never exhausted. For everybody donates. The one of his affluence and the other of what he can spare. Through one gate enter the people who give; through the second gate come the poor who are in need of gifts. In long lines they stand here before the house in the side street where money is being distributed. Whoever comes first is first attended to, those who came later follow and while the late comers look longingly at the entrance, impatient for their turn, those who have received their gifts are swiftly moving away and are happy. The others gaze after them full of doubt, anxiously questioning: Will something be left for us?

It has become quiet. The streets in which an hour ago stood thousands of refugees are almost lonely. It is Sabbath! It came so quickly, so unexpectedly for these poor people that they could not prepare themselves.

I pass a small house of prayer. I enter. The small room is filled to overflowing. And I forget everything that I have just seen. I suddenly feel myself wrapped in the sanctity which reigns here. Something hot, feverish, lies in the features of the people!

The soft murmuring dies. It is still. The stillness has something heavy, oppressive!

They probably think of home! Their home appears before them, the home of the Jew, which constituted his highest happiness.

It is Sabbath! They see themselves in their dwelling-room after a week full of toil, they are surrounded by those who are near and dear to them! Oh, where did it all vanish?

Burning hatred arises against the enemy! Retribution for the torments and tortures of decades! O, Eternal destroy our terrible foe, the Russian people!

Someone uttered the cry, "O, Eternal!" with a groan and the words break the stillness! Out of the hearts filled with anguish it wells forth towards heaven: "Help! O, Eternal!"

It is the same in the house of prayer nearby, in the synagog, in the large place, it is the same everywhere. It seems to me that they stretch out their hands to one another, all, all, over the city, over the country, over the wide world.

In the street after divine worship! They are still filled with the prayers. They step out of the house of God. They want to hurry home. Whither? And they look in the distance so perplexed, so bereft of support! The soft glow vanishes from their faces! Misery and misfortune are there expressed! One looks at the other! I am just like you! And is stricken dumb. The thousands stand still for a moment. This motionless attitude is unutterably significant, this silence! Sabbath under free heaven! Only here and there above a glittering star.

A few go to their dwellings! Into their room, in which the entire family must find accommodation.

I join a big crowd of people. They are going to the Jewish free kitchen. The eating takes place in four groups. Here and in numerous other rooms.

The brightness, the warmth, the light, they conjure the Sabbath before them!

At the long tables sit the hungry! They refresh themselves with food and drink! Hundreds of others are waiting outside with the meal card in the hand. They all get a chance.

The happiness which I see bestowed here moves me deeply. I again step into the street. The boy before me cries: "I am hungry!" I gain admission for him. Also for the woman who stands there against the market stall. Others approach me. I hastily go away, weak, helpless.

I stand on the street corner. Many refugees pass by me. They make a dark gloomy impression in their long, black Kaftans. I speak to one of them. It is always the same. The same sad fate! They left everything at home, fled from the enemy and came here.

There is something beautiful, illuminating in all the stories; they will gladly bring the sacrifice, if only the enemy is conquered, when they will be able to return home quietly.

Pride and power are in their words: when they tell of their sons who are at the front.

A Jew is dragging himself along toilsomely leaning upon his staff. Stops and speaks to another one a short while; then he stumbles along. Wants to come near me. I make it easier for him. "What are you seeking?" I ask. "My wife and my child!" And I cannot help him. He was in the neighboring city and fled from there. He could not reach his wife and child. Does anyone know of them? Are they still living? Have they fled?

He drags himself farther. He stops everybody. "Mister, do you not know where they are, my wife and my child?" From the by-street I hear softly: My wife and my child?

A boy is walking among the crowd. He is perhaps sixteen years of age. Thin, with sunken cheeks, dark locks at the forehead. Wrapt in the long Kaftan, a heavy burden on the back! He is just coming from the depot. He was many days on the road and is now seeking a lodging place. As I see the boy walking along with the burden on his back, I am strangely reminded of: "Wander, Jew! Wander farther!"

Oh, when will you find rest at last?

A shout of joy! Two persons are embracing, so happily, so fervently. Two Jews of the same village have met! In the village they were strangers to one another.

Here in the city they are closely united.

Is this not the home which they found again?

Slowly the streets become empty of people. I go home. I pass the market stalls. There against the dimly burning street lamp leans a Jew hoary with age. He is deeply absorbed in his book: he studies!

I walk away softly, not to disturb him.

For awhile I stand in front of my house. I gaze across the wide place, away into the distance, to the mountains. Suddenly I know it, it now becomes clear to me. A mighty tenderness floods my being!

You are refugees from distant regions. Who knows you?

But we came to you, all with glad hearts, to help you.

All at once we feel so young, so strong: You are one with us, we all, in the most distant lands are one, a united people!

THE WAR AND THE JEWS

Paper read by Jos. L. Tepper, President, before Argo Lodge No. 413, I. O. B. B., Washington

When the future historian will come to chronicle this decade, he will stop aghast at the stupendous crime that is now being perpetrated by the rulers of Europe against humanity and civilization. He will also delineate to the future generations what are now to us subjects for speculation, the results and effects of this appalling contest and carnage. Whether Germany with her allies, Austria and Turkey, will be able to stand their ground to the end against overwhelming odds and thus preserve their political and racial integrities, an eventuality that does not, in the face of facts and figures, seem probable to the rational mind, one thing is reasonably certain to be the outcome of this cataclysm. It is that great and momentous changes will be wrought in the social and political relations of all nations. The territorial changes will be far exceeded in importance by the social evolution, not from above by means of formal treaties but in the hearts and minds of the nations themselves. It may never again be possible to array them against each other in murder and rapine as has been done this time. While we are pained beyond description at the indescribable suffering and misery of the millions, aside from the economic suffering that is visited upon ourselves, we must deem it in a sense at least a privilege to live through this most extraordinary epoch of all times.

One distinct effect, however, of this upheaval is alreay apparent. The leaders and statesmen of belligerents and neutrals alike of every nation are already at this early stage of the combat, speculating, scheming and planning how to be the gainers from this deluge of human blood: to rear towers of security and blessings on the graves of the millions of victims and martyrs. We Jews will have more than our share of victims and martyrs, both among the dead and living, and perhaps the greater sufferers among the living. The star of ill fate in this, as in all other world disasters, pursues the house of Israel more ruthlessly than others. Not enough that it had to furnish its quota of human sacrifices and that the persecuted and maligned Jew of Russia is compelled to shoot down in cold blood his equally persecuted and maligned brother of Austria, the theater of the war on the east is the Russian pale and Galicia, where two-thirds of the Jewish nation throughout the world abide. To them this war, aside from other horrors, is economic and financial murder. The question naturally suggests itself, where do we come in? What will be our reward for the awful sacrifice and loss?

It is not sufficient to say as does Mr. Zangwill, in substance, that Jews should not view this war from the narrow angle of their own interests and prejudices, but from the standpoint of the good of the majority, for we are taught by experience that the "majority" rarely in such instance includes the Jew, certainly not in Russia. Besides, all this prating of fighting for the freedom of the world is like an actor's declamation to the gallery—in this instance England is the skillful actor to the world gallery, for woe to that freedom that has Russia for its champion. Neither England nor any of the other combatants rushed into this world tragedy for the altruistic purpose of preserving freedom. Everyone had a paramount self interest at stake in this struggle and the result will surely show that those interests are vindicated by the successful. The peace convention that will ultimately settle and adjust these claims will have difficult problems with which to grapple to satisfy these champions for the world's freedom. What then will be our prize? By whom and how will our claims be advanced? Is there a leadership in Jewry that is equipped for this work? [illegible] not a problem among the other nations, big or little. They are provided with diplomatic organizations to act for them. [illegible] No one will pretend that [illegible] permit [illegible] opportunity to [illegible] back to subjugation, persecution and the humiliating [illegible] we have been accepting for centuries.

It is true we have, especially in these United States, a number of organizations national in scope, but these mainly supply material demands of a temporary kind: hospitals, sick benefits, etc. [illegible] work is at stake as [illegible] advertising purposes and to secure prestige among prospective patrons. Aside from this they are without adequate leadership. The great B'nai B'rith is an exception. It does nothing for ulterior purposes. In fact years ago it discarded all material benefits to its membership and by process of elimination secured a membership of the highest type. Its leadership is excellent and under the broadminded and progressive policy laid down by it, the organization is quite as active in ameliorating conditions of the Jews morally, socially and politically as well and better than materially by means of charity organizations. But it never pretended to have any definite political solution or scheme whereby to solve the Jewish problem abroad. At most, it can only be regarded as an effective agency for the temporary relief of suffering Jews whether their ills be material, political or social. It does not offer a permanent solution. In a less degree, the same may be said of The Ica, The American Jewish Committee and the German Hilfsverein.

There is, however, one movement international in character and scope that knocks at our gates and claims to have the desirable panacea for the Jewish problem and at this particular crisis, claims to be the proper agency through whom international Jewry ought to speak and act. It is Zionism. Let us give it some consideration. The essence of its ideal arises from Jewish political disintergration, and dispersion. Religious Jews of all shades have from time immemorial been praying for their return to Palestine. But so unlikely and remote have been the probabilities for the realization of that hope, that in time it became nothing more than a mechanical wish daily repeated by the lips, without a throb of the heart. It had no secular expression, for, indeed, orthodoxy impliedly enjoined secular interference. The millennium was to be reached by divine intercession, the coming of the Messiah, who would dissolve human society and reorganize it on a celestial basis. To what mischief this superstition led will be recalled by the fiasco of that celebrated charlatan Sabbatai Zebi in the 17th century, and his imitators. It will be observed that it was the land Palestine that this Jewish erstwhile hope laid stress on, not political integrity and freedom. So that a Jewish independent state outside of Palestine would not be a realization of that hope, while Palestine, with greatly restricted political rights, would be. Little by little, however, this dead mechanical hope gave rise to virile, practical thought in the minds of the secular leaders in Jewry.

One of the earliest to advocate political nationalism was Perez Smolenskin, a prolific Jewish Russian writer, between 1869 and 1884. In his leading work "Am Olam" (An Eternal People) he elaborates on the basic idea that "an eternal people must keep an eternal ideal and that ideal is Zionism." Prof. Richard Gottheil has the following to say of Smolenskin: "Here, for the first time in Russia, a view of Jewish Nationalism was proclaimed that was civic and social, not religious. The old inherited Messiahnic doctrine had become secular * * * *" These thoughts bore fruit, not only in the Russian pale, but in the remotest corner of the Diaspora. The principles thus advocated by Smolenskin were given more concrete and definite form and expression in the work of Leo Pinsker, a Russian Jewish physician, in 1882 in his work entiled "Auto-Emancipation." Pinsker goes even further than did Smolenskin in secularizing and I might say modernizing the Jewish hope for escape from the Goluth and persecution. He completely renounces the Messianic hope of Jewish restoration by means of divine intercession and boldly comes out for Jewish independent colonization either in Palestine or any other fit and available territory. He kindled the imagination and enthusiasm of the advanced type of Russian Jew who had been disillusioned of all hopes of improvement by reason of the then reform waves culminating in the celebrated political revolutions of the century that had their start in the French Revolution. The Jew, with characteristic zeal, loyalty and idealism, actually gave freely of his blood for the emancipation of Europe from autocratic oppression, hoping and expecting that his own salvation was in the freedom to be gained. But when it was all over and when these revolutions had at least in part attained their end, the Jew was generously repaid by that systematized ostracism and persecution known since as anti-Semitism. Then came the massacres, and the Russian May Laws of 1881, the death blow to jewish Assimilationists, and to Jewish hope from without. These causes quickened the Jewish impulse to such hopes and propositions as were sponsored by Pinsker and others. The culmination of these hopes found tangible expression in the organization of the Chovevi Zion (Lovers of Zion) with headquarters at Odessa, Russia, and branches later in Austria, Germany, England and even the United States. This organization however, limited its activities to assisting colonization and disseminating culture among the Jews in Palestine and did not quite attain the ambition of Pinsker's ideal that these Jewish Colonies enjoy a degree of political autonomy. Notwithstanding the limitation, the father of the movement, Pinsker, was reconciled to these restricted activities until there sprung up amidst Jewry an ambitious, aggressive and loyal spirit in the person of Asher Ginsburg, otherwise known in the literary world as Ahad ha Am and with his determined agitation stimulated the Jewish national consciousness. He was not satisfied with the makeshift of a few isolated Jewish colonies under Turkish rule, in Palestine, for a few Jewish refugees in persecuted lands. His aim was to stir the Jewish consciousness to a realization of the humilating and helpless position the Jewish people occupy in the family of nations. Though the oldest they were yet a people without home or country scattered to the four corners of the world, subject to the whim of every tyrant. Beyond stirring up discussion in the Jewish press and the organization of a few feeble societies to advocate his principles, Ahad ha Am did not accomplish more, save, than as the title of one of his books indicates, "to show the way to life" for the Jewish nation; a life of self respect, independence and honor. To make this idea popular, commanding and irresistible required a personality, a leader of men. Such a man was found in Theodor Herzl, the publicist of Vienna. Not that he added anything to the basic principles of the movement, for his pamphlet "Judenstaat," the Zionist classic, contains little that Pinsker and Ahad ha Am had not already suggested. It is the cool, logical and dignified style of his work that makes it unique and likewise it was the dignified, albeit convincing philosophy in Herzl, that placed him at the head of this world-wide Jewish movement. "It was his intellectual grace and persuasive enthusiasm that immediately attracted to him a band of determined and zealous followers," says Prof. Gottheil of him. The slogan adopted by Herzl and his disciples was "give to the people without a country, the country without a people." Here we see that the objective was the Jewish state, a nation among nations. Palestine was to be preferred, but if not Palestine, then any other territory that would lend itself to the necessities of a political territory. So it was at least among a large section of the Zionists, since the religious motive of reacquiring Palestine was placed in the background and the material and urgent need, that is, a haven of social and political refuge, was advanced to the foreground. The matter of hemisphere or locality could therefore not come into conflict with these latter essentials since the central idea was the Jewish state wherever available or practical. Thus, many propositions and offers to undertake Jewish settlements under charters granting autonomy in East Africa and other parts of the world were seriously considered. But after a process of elimination, Palestine was determined on by the vast majority of Zionists not only as desirable for reasons of tradition but as the most available and practical both on political and physical grounds. This conclusion, however, was not reached until carefully pondered over by the best of Jewish brains, including scientists, scholars and statesmen of great renown by means of extended scientific expeditions and other investigations and study. And having arrived at the above conclusion, Zionism, to quote from the Basel Program, has set its aim "to establish for the Jewish people a publicly and legally assured home, in Palestine. For the attainment of this purpose, the Congress considers the following means serviceable: (1) the promotion of the settlement of Jewish agriculturists, artisans and tradesmen in Palestine; (2) the federation of all Jews into local or general groups, according to the laws of the various countries; (3) the strengthening of the Jewish feeling and consciousness; (4) preparatory steps for the attainment of those governmental grants which are necessary to the achievement of the Zionist purpose." To what extent they succeeded since the above program was adopted in 1897 let us judge them by their accomplishments: they have established

I. Educational:

(1) Bezallel School, Jerusalem.

A school of arts headed by Professor B. Schatz: has eight hundred students, enthusiastic pioneers in Jewish art, who support themselves by their work in the school.

(2) Gymnasium, Jerusalem

A high school and college modeled after European schools.

(3) Micro-Biological Institute, Haifa.

Devoted to the study of Palestine soil in its climatic and scientific conditions, and to the best methods for the preservation of life and crops. Established in honor of Dr. Max Nordau.

(4) Polytechnical School, Haifa.

Built by German and American Jews, through the propaganda of the Zionist movement.

(5) Mizrachi College, Jerusalem.

Unofficial school. Devoted to Rabbinical education.

(6) Jewish National Library, Jerusalem.

30.000 volumes.

(7) A university is to be established by vote of the last Congress in Vienna.

II. Financial:

(1) The Jewish Colonial Trust, Limited. Established by the Zionist Congress, with an English Charter. Capital stock two million pounds sterling. Has about one hundred thousand stockholders. Price per share of stock $5.00. The trust has established two branches:

The Anglo-Palestine Company, the finnancial agent of the Zionist movement. Caters directly to the Palestinian settlers.

A bank at Jaffa and five sub-branches in Palestine. The Turkish branch is known as the Anglo-Levantine Company.

(2) The Jewish National Fund, Limited

Its aim is the acquisition of land in Palestine and Syria which shall be the property of the Jewish people. Now has about two million marks, secured mainly through the sale of stamps and from inscriptions in the Golden Book of the Jewish National Fund. The latter is a means of handing down the name of the donor to posterity. The National Fund has been instrumental in establishing the Herzlwald, a Jewish National Park, and is also conducting the plantation of olive groves.

At the Zionist Conference at Hamburg, a resolution was adopted whereby provision was made for the direct redemption of Palestine from non-Jewish hands. Every Jew, in whatever country he lives, is requested to purchase at least one dunam (one-fourth of an acre), of Palestinian soil at $5. This institution is meeting with great success in this country.

III. Co-operative Colonization:

Through the initiative of Professor Franz Openheimer, the Zionists are establishing co-operative communes in Palestine. Tel Aviv, said to be the most beautiful garden city in the world, has been established in the outskirts of Jaffa.

Let us not, however, suppose by this brief recital of the progress and development of the Zionist movement that all was, to use a colloquialism, clear sailing. Its propaganda from without was not hindered anywhere with some exceptions by the Russian Government. Indeed it received much encouragement, notably from the British Government the East African offer and its general sympathetic attitude. The discouragement came from within, from among the Jews, as it does to this very day. Paradoxical as it may seem, two separate forces in Judaism have and are doing their utmost to thwart its progress. These two forces are factions that by process of evolution have broken away from the main body of traditional orthodox Judaism, though as far apart from each other as the poles. They are the radical and reformed Jews. The indifference of the radical towards nationalism is not hard to explain. Radicalism in the main is international and refuses to be curbed by national bonds or prejudices. Universal brotherhood is its ideal, its aim. It cannot therefore affiliate itself with a movement that is less. It is only when the radical Jew realizes by humiliating experience that his radical Christian brother discriminates against him on racial grounds that he turns a hopeful and apologetic face to the nationalist movement. But the apathy of our feformed brethren rests on no such rational basis. Their attitude does not lend itself to an easy analysis unless we attribute to them unworthy motives. Scientific anti-Semitism as such, thanks to the iron chancellor Bismarck, is a German product, the home of reformed Judaism. Though one of their ablest leaders, Moses Hess, a political writer of the middle of the nineteenth century wrote a great work entitled "Rome and Jerusalem, the Latest National Question" which laid down the historic and economic basis of modern Zionism, the propoganda failed to take root with one exception perhaps in the case of Heinrich Graetz, the historian, who was moved to say "The Jewish race is approaching and under our very eye, a rejuvenescense which would formerly not have been thought possible." The influence of these two men, however, availed nothing on the main reform movement which from the beginning of its existence adopted a most extraordinary and unique theory to justify perhaps its very birth. That theory shorn of all the poetry of its enthusiastic expounders, is that the Almighty Creator of this great and wonderful Universe has created us and keeps us here for but one single, solitary purpose, to perpetuate, invigorate and spread the Hebraic religion, which of course, is the only true and genuine religion. Why that same divine power should have at first permitted us to lead a political and national existence for centuries and then, at the expense of great bloodshed and misery to his "chosen children," send them out to boost his religion, that doctrine does not attempt to explain. Nor does it take into account that all of us are not theologians, ministers and rabbis and are not prepared to be martyrs for the propagation of a religion that is vehemently rejected by the vast majority of the world's inhabitants, however good, beneficent and lofty that religion be. On the contrary most of us are plain, ordinary, commonplace individuals with the usual human wants, instincts and aspirations. Most of us are also engaged in the material pursuit of life, liberty and happiness that was such an important issue in revolutionary days. To force ourselves upon unwilling nations with our simon-pure brand of religion to my simple mind, savors somewhat of the manner of a Don Quixote. Besides, as in the case of the parable that Nathan the Wise related to the Sultan, has the genuine ring ever been identified? Each of the great religions of the past and present claims infallability. Each claims superiority over all others. It is only natural that they should. Religion being a product of the human mind, it is tainted with its defects, one of which is egoism. Yet, the more broadminded and progressive followers of each of these great religions are developing into a frame of mind where they admit that other religions are almost if not equally as good and as great as their own and that the essence of all religion is the same, viz.: the good they bring to mankind, mere boundaries of race, name and ritualism to the contrary notwithstanding. It may not be amiss to say that it is that very theory of "ours is the best" which in politics is called Chauvinism, that brought about more misunderstanding and bloodshed than is generally credited, for that was the basis of all religious wars and persecutions.

But grant for the sake of argument, that it is a desirable end to attain, it would seem that the Jews could much more effectively carry on this missionary work if they had a politically independent and legally assured home and surely our reformed brethren should support the nationalist movement if not as an end, at least as a means to an end. The nations who today carry on large and efficient missions are the nations who are politically organized and rest on a materially prosperous basis. The Hebrew adage "Ain Kemach Ain Torah" which freely translated means "where there is hunger there is no learning" applies with special emphasis. If a nation is to disseminate the gospel of truth and justice, it must be free of the cares of need and must at least he unhampered by persecutions. That assuredly could only be expected of a politically free and socially liberated people, not a people trodden under the dirty heels of the Moscovite or the vicious sneer of the Teuton anti-Semite.

It is exceedingly unfortunate that American reform Judaism has adopted the antagonism to Zionism of their German compatriots, and even added zest and determination to that spirit. No opportunity is overlooked to attack it albeit they are forced to admit, as they do, that Zionism makes for stronger racial ties and promotes national unity; a distinct gain to the religious phase of Jewish life, to them the essence of Jewish existence. Wherefore, then, this inconsistency? It is difficult of explanation. One, however, may be offered with apologies to the sensitiveness of our friends. When the future historians come to analyze the psychology of this war they will find that exaggerated German pride and intolerance for the views of others that conflict with their own contributed as much as any other cause to the outbreak. It is also a recognized fact that ethnically the Jew is sooner influenced by surroundings than perhaps any other race; hence the rapidity with which he adapts himself to new circumstances. Thus the character of the Russian Jew is Russian, French Jew French, German Jew German, etc. Having preceded the Russian and Galician Jew in the United States by several decades and advanced himself to a higher level of prosperity and refinement, he ascribes his opportunities to his own inherent superiority in all things. For him to lead the way is natural, but to be led is humiliating. Zionism is largely an importation of Russia and Austria, and to follow a movement of those looked upon as inferiors is not to be thought of. True, it is not of course the official explanation, but it is the psychological and subconscious motive of the opposition. All this is not said with the slightest intention of in any way discounting their other excellent qualities, particularly in the field of philanthropy of which their newly arrived and poorer Russian and Galician brothers are mostly the beneficiaries. Their work along these lines is more constructive, systematic and efficient than that of any other branch of Jewry. Will they be able, in this appalling crisis, to rise above themselves and cast aside petty pride? Will they lend their great influence and prestige to the only movement that offers a permanent and practical solution to the Jewish problem? I think they will. Indeed the tide has already set in. In Europe the Nationalist movement is engulfing the best, as typified by Max Nordau, Israel Zangwill, Dr. Hertz of London, and others. The same is happening in the United States, as evidenced by the affiliation of Louis Brandeis of Boston, Nathan Strauss, Dr. J. L. Magness, Dr. Stephen Wise, Dr. Wortheimer, Rabbi Heller, and many lesser lights. Indeed I am told that many B'nai B'rith lodges have Zionistic tendencies. It was said that the tree of liberty is often nourished by the blood of human sacrifice. With bated breath and beating heart we will watch and see what this appalling sacrifice of human blood will do for the tree of Jewish hope.

JUSTICE TO THE JEWS

The civilized world—or that part of it which is not hopelessly prejudiced—will accord heartily with the desire of the Jewish emancipation committee calling for representation of the members of their sect at the peace congress following the war, that the political disabilities from which they suffer may be wiped out. It is a disgrace to the so-called Christian nations of Europe that they have harbored their hatreds against the Jews for so many centuries, and emancipating them from the political, civil and commercial handicaps under which they have labored so long in some countries is a work of first importance for the congress of the nations to follow the war.

A century ago, the Congress of Vienna fought out the great question of emancipation of the African slaves to a satisfactory conclusion, and no part of the page of history inscrolled then was more honorable or more lovely. To confer justice on the Jews of the world, wherever they may be downtrodden and oppressed, is a task equally imperative and equally noble in aim, and the nations party to this war cannot neglect it if they are not to stultify their own moral growth and grandeur.—Editorial in St. Paul Pioneer Press.

COMMUNAL ACTIVITY IN SHANGHAI

Considerable interest is being taken in Shanghai in the reorganization of the community under the religious guidance of a Rabbi who is to be appointed shortly in view of the building of the new synagogue towards which Sir Jacob Sassoon, Bart., of Bombay, has contributed 150,000 rupees. A special maintenance fund is being raised, and already amounts to about £1,500, nearly half of which has been contributed by Messrs. David Sassoon and Co.

A JEWISH WAR ARCHIVE.

A number of our Austrian coreligionists have established a "Jewish War Archive" in Vienna. They collect field post letters and documents of all kinds which have reference to the Jews of Austria.

JEWS AND CHRISTIAN SCIENCE.

Science Church, like all Christian who crosses the threshold of the church. Rich and poor alike are given the same cordial greeting and warm handshake. And the Christian Science Church that gains its recruits from all other churches, must outdo them all in regard to good fellowship and fraternization. Outside of the church, however, this praiseworthy spirit of democracy and brotherhood is generally absent. Social lines are drawn as sharply as everywhere else. The rich have their rich friends, and the poor have their poor companions, or are left to look for them and find them.

We Jews seek no converts from among the adherents of other faiths, and we feel that we need offer no special inducements to our own people to tempt them to pay the synagogue a visit, and to become affiliated with a Jewish congregation. We consider it the duty of every Jew to do so, to help support the Jewish institutions of the community, religious, educational and charitable; and we consider it his privilege to share in whatever advantages such institutions afford. The stranger, the newcomer, has the same privileges and the same obligations as the old settlers. One derives no greater benefit from the synagogue than the other. It is no more in the interest of the one than of the other that the synagogue should receive hearty moral and material support.

Yet there are many Jews nowadays who think and feel differently about the matter. It is due to the influence of our Christian environment. The newcomer expects greater cordiality, a warmer welcome on the part of the older members. The poor members wish to receive some recognition from the rich. They feel offended by the cold indifference they often meet, by the formation of clans, and cliques, and circles, in the synagogue; by the rich and smart flocking together without paying any attention to the others. Many a Jew, especially if he be a newcomer in the community, joins the synagogue for social reasons. He wishes to meet people, to get acquainted, to make friends. He soon finds himself sadly disappointed and disillusioned when he receives no attention from the leading families, the smart set.

This is not exactly as it should be. It is certainly desirable that in the synagogue, as in the church, a friendly reception should be accorded the stranger and the new arrival, and that greater sociability should be cultivated among all the members. There is room for improvement along these lines in the modern synagogue. But is that any justification for any sensible, earnest, right-minded Jew, for turning his back upon the synagogue and his coreligionists, and joining the church, Christian Science, or any other? Is that all that a man's religious convictions are worth? Is the value of the synagogue merely that of a social club, an agency to promote sociability?

Shall We Jews Surrender?

Can any Jew of thought or feeliing, and of manly principle, so easily surrender to the camp of our opposition, Christianity? Consider Israel's martyrdom during the hundreds of years of Christianity's existence. Read any chapter of the classic work of our historian, Greatz, dealing with that period; or read that little book, "The Sufferings of the Jews During the Middle Ages," by Zunz, in order to get some idea of the Jew's tragic fate as a result of Christianity's domination over the world.

Christianity's symbol, the cross, a symbol which Jewish Christian Scientists often display with pride, has a very real significance for us Jews. While to the Christian it symbolizes the mythical crucifixion of his Savior, to us Jews it stands for the real crucifixion, or martyrdom, of Israel, wherever the Christian church had power and control. Throughout the Middle Ages and even now in certain semi-barbarous Christian countries, the cross has been, and is, a symbol of dread and terror to the Jew.

With the cross carried at the head of the procession, the savage hoards in medieval times fell upon the Jewish quarters, and pillaged, destroyed, and murdered their innocent and defenseless denizens. With the cross held before them, the Jewish victims were dragged to the funeral pyres of the Inquisition. Bearing crosses and icons, the Russian Black Hundreds and their hired hooligans are the chief actors in the modern pogroms. And when lately the champions of the cross against the crescent, the Greek soldiers, took possession of the Turkish seaport, Salonica, the major portion of the population of which was Jewish, a cry of anguish and distress went up from the Jewish habitations of that city: "The Greek soldiers are plundering the Jewish quarters, destroying synagogues and attacking women."

And all that we have suffered, and still suffer, because we have been the world's true protestants against Christianity, although mostly passive; because we have been unyielding in our resistance to its claims of superiority, of being the only saving faith; because we have refused to surrender to it.

The intelligent and unbiased student of history knows that the only explanation of the past and present prejudice against the Jew, the real ultimate source of hostility against him, the origin of all his troubles, are Christianity and the Church. The Jesus story of the Gospels has stamped the Jew as the accursed of God, and the Church has been only too willing to impress this idea upon the minds and hearts of its votaries. In the Gospels the Jew is painted in the blackest colors. He is a deicide. An eternal curse, therefore, rests upon him.

It is this that has made the name Jew a byword among the peoples. Why should such a creature be allowed to live in peace and comfort in our midst? the simple-minded Christian believer asked himself. And the savage instincts of the mob, and the greed of the rulers, and the fanaticism of the clergy, gave such answer as is now recorded in our history in tears and blood. And the same story, still being dinned into the ears of old and young, in church and Sunday school, in the religious press and literature, what thoughts and feelings toward the Jew can we expect on the part of Christians?

But, thank God, we have lived to see the day when the church has lost its power to compel submission to its doctrines and its arrogant claims, and to punish dissenters and heretics; when larger and ever larger bodies of Christians are modifying the doctrines of their faith in accordance with modern enlightened ideas furnished by science and history, thus bringing them ever closer to the doctrines of liberal Judaism, the teachings of our prophets; when equally large numbers of so-called Christians are leaving the church entirely, and taking refuge in systems of thought either indifferent or hostile to Christianity.

Shall the Jew now surrender to the Christian faith, and especially to that new offshoot, Christian Science, which is really a recrudescence of its most superstitious elements? Consider it well, dear reader. If you are not bereft of a sense of loyalty and pride, of a feeling of sympathy for those who have unjustly suffered and still suffer, and a feeling of resentment against injustice, oppression, falsehood, and hypocrisy, pause and think, before you yield to the allurements of the new cult.

MORE RUSSIAN ACTS OF VIOLENCE AGAINST THE JEWS.

So many reports of horrible deeds enacted by the Russians against the Jews are pouring in from reliable sources that it is impossible to publish all of them. We can only make extracts from these reports. In Zitow the Russians hanged Mendel Shiffmann, 72 year old, his son Herschel, 48 years old, Leser Perlmutter, 50 years old; his son-in-law and the 70-years old Joseph End, for having accommodated some Austria-Hungarian soldiers. In Odessa a young man who had just married was drafted to military service. His young wife remained without any means of support. She went to her well-to-do parents in St. Petersburg. But there she was, arrested because on account of her mariage in Odessa she lost her right of domicile in St. Petersburg. She was brought to Odessa per "Etapp," which took several weeks. Per Etapp means that those who are to be returned to the pale from places where they have no right of domicile are attached to gangs of all kinds of criminals and tramps. The whole transport marches on foot guarded by a convoy of armed soldiers and spends the nights in the prisons of the different stopping places on the way. In Czernowitz the Russians levied a tax upon the Jews only and as the Jewish community was unable to pay the high tax, the Russian officials closed the synagogue and prohibited the Jews from visiting the coffee houses. The Russian commander refused to receive the Jews under any circumstances. According to the testimony of Dr. von Repta, metropolitan of Czernowitz, the Russians treat the Jews of the Bukowina with the greatest brutality. Surely the English and French can be proud of their "eminent" ally.

UNGRACIOUS FAULTFINDING.

Our brethren in Europe are sorely tried. We have sighed for them, we have prayed for them. Whatever our feeble efforts have been able to accomplish for them, we have attempted. We know that to make full reparation in the havoc which has been wrought would tax the resources of a richer treasury than is at our command. We organized ourselves for relief and the people have responded to the call for money. Food and clothing have also been offered freely. As things are we are reaching out a helping hand, but alas! efforts are made to prevent the sufferers from grasping it. Yet the critic's voice has been heard. It does not indeed come from the area of suffering. It could not come from there. It comes from a snug corner where the pinch of gaunt hunger has not made itself felt and where there is no harassed population in want of shelter and the very necessaries of life.

That the American people has always been treated with scant courtesy by Europeans is a well-known matter. To those who used to think that this snarling at Americans and all things American was the prerogative of the German boasting of his superior "kultur" it must be a distinct shock to find that this time the affront has come from our British cousin. "Mentor" in the "Jewish Chronicle" is dissatisfied with us Americans in general and with the American Jew in particular. He upbraids us with niggardliness. We have not collected enough money. But then, he says, we have taken on the nature of the dollar-hunting American. We have become immersed in money-making. All this is of course sheer calumny, whether directed against the American or the American Jew. The charge, coming as it does from a British Jew, is nothing short of the ridiculous. As good neutrals and in obedience to the wise counsel of our chief magistrate we will refrain from opening up the question as to who is responsible for the war. We, each one of us privately, know or at least we think we know enough of European conditions and history to answer that question. It may be said that, aside from sympathies due to prior allegiance, the American people has pretty much made up its mind that some blame attaches to all the belligerents. If they all prepared for the war, they now have it. If they all sowed the seeds of hatred they are now reaping the harvest. If commercial competition is at the root of it all, it has been of long standing. If racial animosities brought the war on, they have been long in the making. And the world catastrophe is engulfing humanity outside the ranks of belligerents. [illegible] in Europe and America [illegible] in losses untold

The position of a neutral is always a delicate one. Our government, supported as it is by all true American patriots, is exerting all its efforts to keep ourselves out of the mess. If indeed we are to prove of service to Europe we must keep our heads cool. We alone are able to sell, aye, to give of our surplus in food and money if only the seas were free. And we American Jews, thank God, are yet free to offer our aid and sympathy to our unfortunate brethren no matter where placed. Not being a party to the conflict, we take no sides. We feel for the English Jew and the French Jew and the Belgian Jew and the German Jew and the Jew in Poland and our brother in the Ottoman empire. European Jewry is at present divided. It is their bounden duty to stand by their flags. If a German Jew fights or even writes valiantly, he would be recreant to his duty were he to refrain from so doing. We long for the day when amity will be restored between nations and when the Jew will be brought once more near to his brother Jew the world over. Meanwhile it is our privilege to stand watch over the unity of Israel. When the Jewish press of Europe has by the nature of circumstances been reduced to a provincial measure, we will maintain the larger vision, undimmed, unclouded. The carping critic may rest assured that the American Jew, despite the great measure of business depression prevailing in this country, is and will be doing his full duty by his suffering co-religionists. We have given and we will give more. The world ought to know by this time that we are not dollar-hunters, but dollar-givers. Our purse-strings are open, and it is not our fault that our purses are not as fat as they used to be. But whether our fortunes be large or meager, we will share them with our brother-Jew across the waters.

THE MOCKERY OF INTERNATIONAL LAW.

The law which regulates the relations of citizens within the confines of a state or federation of states is complicated enough. The codes are bulky and the legal practitioners all too numerous to point out to the lay mind what may be done and what may not be done and what the punishment will be when an enactment is infringed. What is the ultimate authority? The policeman, so runs the ready answer. The state possesses the visible power to incarcerate the lawless and to take the life of the destroyer of life. But the doctrine of force is as brutal as it is false. For we are not concerned with the enforcement of the law which may or may not be a matter of the police club; we have in mind the sanction which underlies lawmaking. Surely no one in a civilized community will for a moment maintain that law is that which men may promulgate in sheer consciousness of the ability to impose it upon others by the use of force. The ultimate sanction of law is the conscience of man, that God-given voice which knows how to distinguish between right and wrong; its ultimate authority the instinct born of the experience of the race which makes for the well-being of the social aggregate of citizens.

We have international lawyers, but they are merely experts in the law of nations as it affects the citizen of another country. We have also experts in international law acting as counselors in the chancelleries and departments of state. We were wont to believe that the law of nations was a fixed thing, that there were matters that a nation was bound and might be expected to respect. Now in times of peace there may be a certain stability to international relations. In times of war, however, when international law would be particularly invoked, it seems alas to break down completely. Force, brutal force, seems to be the maker of law. That is right, says this or the other nation, which I may be able to secure by the use of arms. It is the highwayman's theory within the state, it is Lynch law that thwarts the courts of a civilized community. Right or wrong seems to be a matter of indifference. Each nation claims that it is engaged in a life and death struggle. Previous agreements are thrown to the wind as so much waste paper. The neutrals seem to be reduced to protesting more or less vigorously, but always with no prospect of being listened to. Keep out of my deadly mines if you can. Your ships, let them stay in home harbors. Or if you seek redress, unsheath your sword and join the fray.

Of course, the Decalogue applies to nations as well as to individuals. There is an international public opinion. If war there must be, certain rules must be adhered to, or else the nation which disregards them will forfeit its place among civilized nations. We are at present witnesses of a sad spectacle. It is sad enough to see the works of peace which it has taken centuries to bring about destroyed overnight. It is sad enough to witness the growth of hatred and embitterment where mutual respect and forbearance have held the ground. But it is sadder still to see civilized mankind revert to primeval anarchy, to piracy on the seven seas, to all the wiles and stratagems on land.

They all pray to the God of battles, but God is One and He is the ultimate source of right and wrong. The old message of the One God, how in wanton boastfulness of human achievements it has been made light of for a century or so! Philosophers have believed that they might rule God out of existence or distribute His sovereignty in democratic fashion among the many. We recall all the systems of pluralism and the like. And we Jews have in moments of hesitation succumbed to many a siren voice. We discerned not the eternal verities of our faith. We were ready to throw overboard the teachings of our great book. And yet at no time has Judaism been so triumphantly vindicated as in these latter days. For theories and creeds have a practical potency. The criminal and bad citizen affront the majesty on high. The nation which in overweenting self-confidence—and it makes no difference whether its strength is of the one kind or another—believes that right is might is a denier of right's source, the Living God. It is because our prophets uncompromisingly held fast to the One God that they proclaimed the vision of the cessation of warfare when nations shall make pilgrimage to the mountain of the Lord and in acknowledging the law of Zion effect a truce that shall not be broken. The international conscience is apparently still in the making. We are much nearer the barbarian stage and much farther away from the goal of Messianic peace. Let therefore the Jew hold fast to his ancient message. The world was never so much in need thereof as it is in these very days. The kingdom of man which the end of days will see established will be one built upon the knowledge that the Judge of the world visits the sins of nations as well as the transgressions of individuals. Then and then only we shall have an international law which will not be a mockery as it is today.

FIRST JEW IN HISTORY TO RECEIVE VICTORIA CROSS

According to a London cable, for the first time in history the Victoria Cross has been awarded to a Jew. This coveted donation was won posthumously by Lieutenant Frank Alexander de Pass, of the Indian Cavalry, who was killed on the same day he accomplished the gallant deed which won him the Victoria Cross.

ANTI-SEMITISM IN GERMANY

Ambassador Von Bernsdorff Predicts Eradication of All Anti-Semitic Sentiment

Recently the New Yorker Staats Zeitung contained an interview with the German Ambassador wherein he gave expression regarding the effect of the services of the German Jews in the present war on anti-Semitic tendencies in Germany. The Ambassador said:

"The results are already visible. Before the war the German Jews enjoyed all civil and political rights; only they could not become officers. Not because the Government was opposed to that, but because they were not chosen by the officers' corps. The Government, with the best of intentions, could do nothing against this, since our officers' corps in this matter enjoy full autonomy.

"But now there are about 200 officers of the Jewish faith in the German army; in other words, the power of events has proved stronger than the prejudices of the officers' corps, inasmuch as the prejudices which existed till now have been broken in no less than 200 cases, one may calmly assert that the prejudice as such no longer exists. As soon as a regiment counts one or more Jews among its officers, it will be impossible for a Jewish candidate for officer's rank in the future to be rejected because of his Judaism. The question of Jewish officers in Germany may be regarded as solved."

In the interview, Count von Bernsdorff dwelt upon the social and political position of the Jews in Germany, and asserted, incidentally, that the Jews in Germany played a much greater part socially than Jews in England or America.

"No English or American Jew occupies such a position in his country, for example, as does Herr Ballin in Germany," he said. "The German Kaiser calls many Jewish gentlemen his friends. Hitherto the Jews in Germany have not fared ill. They were enabled to develop their economic and intellectual forces and to become a great factor in the life of Germany. They have rendered great service and brought about their present strong position in all realms of business and intellectual life, thanks to their energy and ability.

"It is true that anti-Semitism was widespread, but after the war the Jew hatred will disappear completely; for, in the first place, the people will become far more democratic after the war, and, in the second place, the German people is now convinced of the loyalty of the German Jews to the empire and of their honest participation in the present war.

"You must not forget, too, that anti-Semitism in Germany was spread chiefly among the nobility. Through a chain of circumstances and decrees of fate the Jews made themselves snug in a certain branch of life—the business branch, so to speak, as in a capsule. In the meantime trade has grown to be the greatest power, and has surpassed almost all other factors. The nobility, so to speak, remained stationary.

"Under these circumstances a certain bitterness arose in the nobility against the Jews who have contributed so much to the economic growth of Germany. Added to this is the fact that the German nobility does not think along business lines in this matter. In the case of many of the nobility anti-Semitism, however, was merely a foolish political sport. The war will democratize the people, whereby of itself the power of the nobility will be considerably lessened, and the time is growing too serious for foolish sport.

"You know that I myself am not an anti-Semite. One of my ancestors pleaded for the Jews at the Congress of Vienna. I count many Jews among my best friends. I am firmly convinced that, as far as Germany is concerned, anti-Semitism may be regarded as a matter of the past. After the war the Jewish emancipation will be carried out fully and completely."

THE "LONDON TIMES" AND THE "NOVOYE VREMYA" OF PETROGRAD FORM ONE CORPORATION

The Berlin "Lokalanzeiger" learns from a reliable source that for the last two years the London "Times" and the "Novoye Vremya" belong to one corporation. In the fall of 1913 a company was formed in St. Petersburg for the purpose of taking charge of the "Novoye Vremya"—and most of the shares of this company were purchased by the owners of the "London Times." This interesting fact is verified by a manufacturer whose claims against the "Novoye Vremya" were paid by the "Times."

This explains why the "London Times" has of late become so rabidly anti-Semitic.

THE B'NAI B'RITH ORPHANAGE AND HOME FOR FRIENDLESS CHILDREN

As all things have small beginnings, so with this home. Two years and a half ago the B'nai B'rith Orphanage and Home for Friendless Children of District No. 3 was formally opened in a temporary home with three children, two girls and one boy. This number was increased during the year to twenty-four, representing in all twelve families.

The average age of the boys being eleven years and that of the girls only seven and one-half, it has been necessary for the boys to assist with the housework. Their proficiency in dishwashing, sweeping, bed-making and darning is surprising. They have also taken care of the five acres surrounding the temporary quarters with very material results.

The new cottages are in every way modern and provide for the wards the nearest approach to real home life that an institution can offer. Visitors to the temporary home are delighted and astonished at the total absence of everything which they have been accustomed to see in orphanages and similar charitable institutions. They find the same freedom and individuality in the children, the same attachment to the home and its mother, as one finds in the average private home.

The children spend as much time as possible out of doors. What would be more ideal than to teach them how they can put to practical use all the wonderful resources offered by Mother Nature.

The children's splendid health for the past two years has been gratifying. Most of the children come poorly nourished and undersized and it usually takes some time to put them in a physical condition to resist the many epidemics of children's diseases prevalent in public schools. During the two years but one case of whooping cough, one case of scarlet fever and three cases of chicken-pox developed.

The children attended the District School except in the summer. A teacher was engaged to come to the house to continue the school work during the months of May and June. In spite of the fact that it is far from a Sabbath School the religious training of the children has not been neglected. They have been taught children's prayers which are recited in the morning, before and after every meal and before retiring. Friday night, the Sabbath and holidays are observed according to Jewish customs. Every Sabbath they have a lesson in Biblical history.

Last winter the oldest boy was Bar Mitzvah.

The majority of the children are so-called friendless children who have been roaming the streets, coming and going at will. The older boys especially have required a great deal of care and attention to eradicate some of their uncivilized habits and try to develop their good qualities. To maintain discipline was not always a simple matter, but on the whole the conduct has been satisfactory.

The food is plain, wholesome, nourishing, cooked so that it is palatable and relished. The diet is continually varied according to season, coffee and tea are excluded, milk and cocoa being used instead. The kitchen is conducted on a Kosher basis.

The farm has provided plenty of milk, butter, eggs and berries.

JEWS IN ITALIAN PARLIAMENT

With the promotion of Signor Frazzi and Signor Leone Wollemborg to the rank of Senators, there are now eighteen Jews who have seats in the Upper House of the Italian Parliament, while there are sixteen in the Chamber of Deputies. This is entirely out of proportion of the Jewish population in Italy. Signor Wollemborg was for many years a member of the Chamber and in 1901 was given the office of Minister of Finance. Both he and his wife are distinguished in Rome for their participation in works of public utility and charity.

HONORS FOR CIVILIAN RUSSIAN JEWS

The following distinctions have been conferred on Jews: A gold medal and the St. Alexander ribbon on Rabbi Kroshkin of Akerman; a silver medal and the St. Stanislav ribbon on MM. Shur, Fonareff, Sternberg and Kotlarovsky; the St. Stanislav Order on MM. Spanron and Kahan; the St. Vladimir Order on M. Benjamin Baumholtz, and a gold medal and the St. Alexander ribbon on M. Nemetz, the proprietor of the famous mills at Krementchug.

JACOB KIMCHI AND SHALOM BUZAGLO—By Dr. Charles Duschinsky (Luzac & Co. Publishers) London, 1914.

The history of the communal life of the Jews of London is full of interesting incidents. The story of the establishment of the ecclesiastic office of the Chief Rabbinate of Great Britain, of the life of the different incumbents of this exalted post in the synagogue, their administration of the religious affairs of the community, their literary and charitable activities and the manner in which they represented the English Jews in public life, has a charm of its own and makes very attractive reading even for the Jews of remote countries. The information which the author furnishes in his pamphlet on all these subjects is given in a scholarly manner and is based upon reliable data. The name of Jacob Kimchi, the Hebraist and wender of Oriental slippers who was a well known character in London in the last part of the eighteenth century, is especially interesting on account of his discent from the ancient and noted Kimchi family which furnished so many Hebrew scholars, linguists and grammarians. The second name of the title of the pamphlet, Shalom Buzaglo, (or Buzaglio) became conspicuous on account of his cabalistic works and his taking part in the disputes about vaccination, of which he was in favor.

The twenty-one pages of this pamphlet contain enough interesting matter to fully compensate the reader for the time it takes to peruse it.

DISTRESS IN CONSTANTINOPLE.

The Executive Committee of the Order has received a touching appeal from the President of District Grand Lodge No. 11, in Constantinople, requesting financial aid by cable to relieve existing distress in Constantinople. President Niego says, "You can rest assured that the misery is great and that speedy help is very urgent. For two days a touching and sad incident occurred. About ninety women recruited mostly from the poorest district of the city marched to the home of the Chief Rabbi and cried for bread. The scene was heart-rending; the husbands of these poor women have been called into military service. If our B'nai B'rith Order will not step in immediately our co-religionists will be subjected to starvation. Something already has been done for them, but much more remains to be accomplished; this, however, can only be done if the B'nai B'rith will take energetic steps in this sad hour to come to the rescue of our poor co-religionists."

ARCH-DUKE JOSEF WRITES ABOUT THE JEWISH SOLDIERS

The editor of the Hungarian paper, "Egyenloseg," addressed a request to Arch-Duke Josef that he should express his opinion about the behavior of the Jewish soldiers of Hungary who are under his command. The Arch-Duke replied with the following letter: "I had the opportunity to observe my Jewish soldiers and find no difference between them and my other soldiers. Their heroism is admirable, their determination is above all praise. They fought among the Hungarian troops as true Hungarians, shoulder to shoulder against the bleeding Servians and Russians; they have the same share in our successes as their comrades. Among the distinguished heroes the number of Hungarian Jews is not small. I often saw these with my own eyes in the midst of the desperate phases of the terrible fight, and admired their heroism with an exulting heart. The Jew, too, has shown that he is just as good and brave a soldier as the others."

ANOTHER JEWISH MEMBER OF THE ENGLISH CABINET

Mr. E. S. Montagu, M. P., has been appointed Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, to sit in the cabinet. Mr. Montagu's parliamentary career has been brilliant, and he reaches cabinet rank at the early age of thirty-five. He is a cousin of Mr. Herbert Samuels, president of the Local Government Board, of whom he becomes a colleague in the cabinet.

NEW BELGIAN MINISTER IN LONDON.

M. Paul Hymans is designated as the new Minister for Belgium at the Court of St. James. He has had a distinguished parliamentary career and is leader of the Liberal Party and Minister of State. His Excellency's father was a Dutch Jew, and was the first cousin to Mr. Henry Hymans, treasurer of the Brighton congregation.

AN EPOCH-MAKING JEWISH SERVICE

Approximately Five Thousand Worshipers at Great Student Service at the University of Michigan.

Approximately five thousand people, representing every phase of professional and civic life, as well as all shades of religious belief, gathered on Sunday evening, February 21, at the great Hill Auditorium, at Ann Arbor, to participate in the special service arranged for the Jewish Student Congregation of the University of Michigan, by the Board of Regents of the university. Never in the history of the Jewish life of America has a similar gathering been held. Every church in the city of Ann Arbor closed its doors, that all might participate in this service.

The service, including the ritual, which was read by Rabbi Leo M. Franklin, of Detroit, and the music, which was rendered by the choir of Temple Beth El, of that city, and the sermon, which was preached by Rabbi Max Heller, of New Orleans, was intensely Jewish in character, and for that very reason undoubtedly stirred the more deeply the tremendous congregation of reverent worshipers that had assembled to participate in it. It was a distinct triumph, not only for the Jewish Student Congregation, which is the first of its kind in this country, to have been able to elicit such interest and enthusiasm, but it was also epoch-making in the sense that it afforded the first great opportunity that has yet been given to so notable a body of college students and professors to hear the message of the Jew and of Judaism expounded under such favorable auspices. There can be little doubt that of the thousands who were present at this service, only the smallest number had any clear idea before of what a Jewish service meant, and if one may judge by the reverent attention that was given throughout the service, as well as by the enthusiastic praise that was lavished upon it at its conclusion, it is safe to say that the influence of this unique experiment will be widespread for good.

Notable as was the occasion and the opportunity, Dr. Heller rose to it in the fullest sense of the word. His sermon on "Moral Courage in Its Bearing Upon Modern American Conditions" was a scholarly and timely review of the conditions affecting the social, the political, the economic life of the American people. He showed how there is a tendency to exalt physical courage, as in the movement toward militarism, and in the somewhat over-prominent place that is given to athletics in our modern colleges. He dealt with intellectual courage, with the freedom of thought which should be cultivated in great institutions of learning. But higher even than this he regarded moral courage, the courage of the man who, for the sake of his conviction honestly arrived at, dares to stand against the mob and to set himself against the current of the times. He showed how moral courage of this sort has always been characteristic of the Jew, and how, if American life is to attain the heights, it must also become its distinguishing quality.

The choir of Temple Beth El, under the leadership of Mr. William Howland, was at its best. The service read was that for the eve of week days, as found in the Union Prayer Book. All in all the service, which, it is announced, is to be an annual event, marks a new departure in our Jewish life, and one that should be full of significance.

NEWS FROM RUSSIA

A Cracow paper publishes the following:

In their marches through Russian-Poland the Russian troops have enacted pogroms against the Jews in 215 places, where many Jews were killed. Eleven Jews were hanged at Stafzow, two rich Jews were hanged at Kladawa. Many Jews were also murdered in the government of Lublin. In Bychaw 78 Jews were falsely accused of espinoage and hanged; in Krasnystaw the Jewish houses were burned and 200 Jewish families lost all their possessions.

According to official reports the Russians shot an inhabitant of Galician-Dolhopole when they invaded the town, and crucified another upon two pine trees which were grown together. For three days they kept a watch before the tortured victim, until he died. A woman lying sick in bed was literally butchered and her husband shot down. In Dichtinetz the Russians burned 42 houses, among them all the Jewish houses, the public school and the city hall. The inhabitants of the houses were driven out almost naked.

ANNUAL CONVENTION OF DISTRICT GRAND LODGE NO. 4.

The fifty-second annual session of District Grand Lodge No. 4 was opened in the presence of a large number of delegates on Sunday morning, Feb. 21, 1915, in the B'nai B'rith building. Rabbi M. Friedlander of Oakland, Grand Orator, offered prayer.

After the convention was duly organized, President Morris N. Schneider, read his message. He feelingly referred to the dreadful crisis that is facing the Jews of Europe and the Orient on account of the existing war. He dwelt upon the efforts of the Executive Committee of the Order in raising funds for the relief of the war sufferers. He discussed the work of the Anti-Defamation League. The reading of the report was interrupted by much applause, especially where he referred to the number of new lodges established in the District during his administration. The message showed that the District is in excellent condition, both in point of membership and in work accomplished.

The President's message was followed by the presentation of reports of the Secretary and Treasurer and other Grand Lodge officers.

Monday's session was devoted entirely to the discussion and passing of a resolution to exclude from membership anyone marrying out of the faith, with an idea to raise the children in other than the Jewish religion.

The matter of having uniforms for degree teams at initiation ceremonies was considered. Resolution was adopted leaving the matter to the respective lodges.

The resolution that observance of religious customs be observed in and out of the synagogue was adopted with much enthusiasm.

On Tuesday morning's session the resolution referring to the matter of intermarriage was again brought up for discussion and again with the result that it was ordered referred to the convention of the Constitution Grand Lodge.

The election of officers was held in the afternoon with the following results:

Grand president, Harry K. Wolff of San Francisco; first grand vice-president, Harry Newberg of San Francisco; second grand vice-president, David N. Mosessohn of Portland; grand secretary, I. J. Aschheim of San Francisco; grand treasurer, Joseph L. Goldsmith of San Francisco; sergeant-at-arms, Emil Cohn; trustees: Edmund Tauszky, Henry Manser, Milton Meyer; District court of appeals: Henry Schwartz, Abr. Jones, Leon E. Prescoot, M. H. Wascerwitz, I. M. Golden.

Following were elected as delegates to the Constitution Grand Lodge:

I. J. Aschheim, Geo. N. Black, I. N. Golden, H. Guststadt, A. Jonas, J. Nieto, Sig. Sichel, Lucius L. Solomons, Edmund Tauszky, M. H. Wascerwitz, O. I. Wise, E. I. Wolfe.

Owing to the attractions of the exposition the routine business was disposed of with unusual expedition.

The delegates to the convention and their ladies were the honored guests of the committee of fifty, of the San Francisco Lodge, to an exposition dansant, on Sunday evening, Feb. 21, at Scottish Wright Hall. It was a brilliant affair and one of the foremost social events of the season.

SCHOOL FOR JEWISH COMMUNAL WORK.

The Jewish Community (Kehillah) of New York City has worked out a plan and made arrangements for the creation of a School for Jewish Communal Work which, it is expected, will be opened with a summer session beginning in July.

The problem of the Jewish community of the city, numbering a Jewish population of 1,250,000, are growing so large that an ever increasing number of expert communal workers are needed. Phases of religious organization, of Jewish education, of philanthropic and social work, of industry, are already being met by a number of very efficient workers and organizations. But it is for the purpose of providing a systematic supply of the best trained workers that the School for Jewish Communal Work is being projected.

A definite announcement of the plan, faculty and courses will be published before the annual convention of the Jewish Community (Kehillah) of New York City, which is to take place in April. A paper on the whole plan is to be read by Dr. S. Benderly before the National Conference of Jewish Social Workers at Baltimore on May 9.

It is proposed to have the faculty consist of some of the best known communal workers in the country.

HAPPY ENDINGS

A Purim Lecture by Rabbi Edgar F. Magnin of Stockton, Cal.

At bottom the race is optimistic. And it is well. For did men grow discouraged at the thought of the brevity of life and its manifold troubles there would be nothing achieved. There would never be a street paved, a building erectd. In lieu of sanitary precautions filth would give birth to disease and all the misery accompanying it. In place of strong bodies and minds kept healthy by work, there would be flabby muscles and downcast spirits. Hope and faith lie at the bottom of human nature, however. And so we choose to live rather than to exist. The old saw that every cloud hath its silver lining is at the bottom of every normal person's philosophy of life.

Our Optimism.

Our optimism exudes from us all day long. It remains with us at the brink of the grave. We refuse to grow discouraged at ninety-eight, if we be not too oppressed by physical ailments. Some men live to be much older, we say, and who but God knows how long it will please him to preserve us. Moreover, every time we go to sleep on the train and nestle up in our two-by-four berth we are testifying to our supreme faith and optimism. We are putting infinite trust in every telegraph pole along the line, in every employee of the company from the president down to the man who rides the hand-car to inspect the tracks. Nay, more: we are placing our utmost confidence in every spike driven into the ground, in every wooden tie, in every inch of the steel rail that bears us, in every axle and wheel. Should any of these agents, human or inanmite, possess this or that defect, we may well have bidden our family and friends a last farewell. But we are optimistic. We know that all is well and we curse the train if it does not seem to go fast enough.

Optimism in Literature.

This spirit of optimism evinces itself in our literature. Almost every tale, novel, drama, rings with faith and hope in the ultimate triumph of the right. It is seldom that the villain triumps in the end. Contrariwise, his successes are but brief and ephemeral. He may hold the pretty, innocent heroine in his clutches to the inexpressable fury of the spectators, but it is for a moment only. In steps the hero at the critical moment and saves the day. And the hero is typical of the noble, the gallant, the best, in human nature. The villain is soon killed or saves the hero the trouble of doing away with him by committing suicide. The hero and the heroine marry and live happy ever after and the public leaves the theater with a genial smile and a good taste in its mouth.

The Happy Ending.

This is the characteristic happy ending. And the public demands it—demands it because it will endure no triumph of evil and sorrow over happiness and goodness. I know not whether you are aware of the fact or not, but very few plays are bought by the managers that do not end in this characteristic fashion. And the public never tires of it. Occasionally it will tolerate a Shakespeare or an Ibsen deviating from the general rule. But the majority must conform to the public taste. And the public will not go home with tears in its eyes even if the playwright must achieve the impossible. That is why "Damaged Goods" turns out to be undamaged goods before the final fall of the curtain.

The Happy Ending in the Purim Story.

The Purim story possesses the happy ending. It is a story that breathes optimism through and through. Haman, you will recall, is the arch-villain. He has plotted the death of every Jew and Jewess throughout the kingdom of Persia. And this because of Mordecai the Jew who will not bow down or humble himself before him. But Mordecai is too mighty for Haman. It is through his far-sightedness that the queen is a Jewess. Esther, as cousin, is the only one who can come to the rescue of her people. She hazards the terrible risk attached to entering unbidden; she prepares to intercede with the king. Should he not raise his sceptre as she approaches him she is doomed to die. But the oriental despot [illegible] this time. Charmed by her beauty and moved by his intense love for her he raises his sceptre as a sign of his favor. "What wilt thou queen have?" he asks. "It shall be half the kingdom if she so [illegible]." But Esther does not want half [illegible]. It is a pity she did not [illegible] that the modern anti-Semite might [illegible] possessed the so-called "business instinct." What she does want is that the king and Haman attend a banquet that she is to give. To which the king expresses his willingness to attend, and Haman, of course, is only too flattered to resist. It is all as beautiful and poetic as a fairy story. But not to be misled by details, you know the outcome. At the second banquet, Esther betrays Haman's foul designs. She reveals her identity and tells the king that she and her people are to be murdered in cold blood on the thirteenth day of the month of Adar. By a decree of the king the people are saved and Haman is condemned to hang with his family upon the gallows that he had erected for Mordecai. Mordecai is raised to a position of esteem and importance in the kingdom. So do the righteous prevail and "live happy ever after" in the tale. And the wicked are destroyed. Even before the downfall of the last curtain, so to speak, you will recall how Haman is compelled by the king to lead Mordecai through the streets of the city on a mare, calling out, "Thus shall be done to the man whom the king delighteth to honor."

Jewish Optimism.

Now, this is a story charged with Jewish optimism, with optimism on the part of the Jewish writer, because optimism has been a characteristic of the Jew of all ages. It is the story of the triumph of the Jew—the triumph of Israel as a people over its adversaries. Haman is represented therein as the type of the anti-Semite. He is known as Haman the Agagite or Haman the Amalekite. And the Amalekites, you will recall, while no longer extant in the days of the writer of Esther, were always known to tradition as the enemies of the Jews. But what thought has the author in mind? It is simple. Let the Amalekite plot, he says. He shall swing upon the gallows that he builds for God's people, Israel, God's servant, at all events, can not be and shall not be wiped off the face of the earth. Only when the mountain peaks shall depart and the hills be no more shall Israel breathe its last.

Israel's Triumph.

Mark this example of Jewish optimism. The Babylonian swoops down upon Judea and in 586 the Temple is laid in ruins. The palaces of the noble and the hovels of the poor are smoking heaps. The vineyards and golden fields are torn up by the heels of the soldiers and the tramping of the war elephants. And yet Israel does not despair. Out of the burning rubbish heap that was once a mighty city comes the call, "Comfort ye, comfort ye, my people, saith your God" Babylon, the destroyer, is depicted by the prophets as God's tool, his whip, so to speak, by which he reminds Israel of his duty. But this is not to be Israel's destruction as a people. The servant of God can not perish. Cyrus, the king of Persia, is regarded as a "mosheach," the messiah or anointed, one who is to punish Babylon. In due time Israel is to be restored.

And so it was through all the ages. Persia, Greece, Rome, a barbarous, mediaeval Europe, could not make the Jew despair. Jewish hats and badges, pogroms, blood ritual accusations and their accompanying massacres of innocent men, women and children, charges of host desecration and their similar results, a thousand and one laws in modern Russia and Roumania restricting the Jew in the pursuit of business, in the attainment of an education for his children, the more refined and insidious anti-Semitism of Austria today—these things and a thousand fold more persecutions and sorrows could not, do not, and shall not avail anything. Down deep in the heart of the Jewish consciousness, every Ben Brith, every son of the Covenant, knows he is a descendant of those who stood at the base of Sinai. He knows that his people have survived where more powerful peoples have passed away. He knows that his people shall survive when the nations of today shall have passed away and their glory be forgotten and surpassed. He knows he is Mordecai reincarnated; his mother, his sister, his wife, his daughter, Esther. They shall survive and their seed shall survive. The Hamans shall be put to shame. He would do them no injury. History shall recall their errors and their pettiness. Civilization shall scoff at them. That will be sufficient punishment.

Story of Esther National Theme.

True, the story of Esther is not primarily a religious tale. It is national to the core. It does not deal with the subject of God or theology. God does not save the people. Mordecai and Esther are the saviours. And while one might say that God was in back of them, as He is presumed to be in back of natural and historical phenomena, this would not make the work a religious one. The author, true, does not contradict this thought, but he makes no mention of it.

Its Religious Significance for Later Ages

And yet for later generations the story had more than a purely national significance. To a people whose whole life was devoted to religion, whose literature was well nigh a religious literature exclusively, to whom the synagogue was school, social center—almost home—how could it take on any other significance? And then, again, Israel's existence as a people within a people, its isolated life was the outcome of one thing only; was the cause of one thing. Were it not for the purpose of preserving his faith, of keeping his religion intact, Israel would never have had to suffer. A desire to completely assimilate, to convert, and then to supplement that conversion by intermarriage, would have solved all problems. Israel's existence, then, as a distinct people, Israel's suffering because of that fact, was necessarily bound up with the idea of his religious mission. The author of Esther, true, concerned himself with the simple theme of the triumph of the Jew over his enemies. But what need for the Jew to triumph, we ask? To preserve his identity at the expense of so much suffering? There can be only one answer: the Jew lived for his faith: he believed in his mission and his mission was a religious mission.

Triumph of Israel's Mission.

So that Purim comes to us with another interpretation. The story of Esther comes to us not only with the message of the triumph of the Jew over his enemies but the triumph of his faith and the idealism bound up with that faith as over the evils and the falsehoods against which he has fought through the centuries. Haman is more than the anti-Semite; Esther and Mordecai more than the Jewish people. Haman is paganism, whether in its original form or in its later form, mingled as it became with the ethics of Judaism; Haman is injustice, prejudice, superstition, hatred, violence. Mordecai and Esther signify optimism, love, beauty, truth, justice—those things that cluster about the conception of a simple, pure and beautiful monotheism. And the Jew knew that Esther and Mordecai would win out, and so he dreamed dreams of a Messianic age, not when miracles would be performed and the stupid and the impossible happen, but when men would at last begin to realize the rudiments of a pure faith; when their conception of the God of Israel as a God of Supreme Justice and Mercy in the world would prove a vital, potent, all-overwhelming force in their lives, compelling them to live as men should live.

The Messianic Age the Happy Ending.

Israel's conception of a Messianic age was a sane and rational one, and this was to be the happy ending of her history. This was to be her triumph, for in that day there shall be universal peace, more of jusitce and of loving kindness in the world; paganism shall disappear, sect will not fight sect. There will be no more filthy, foul-smelling tenements hanging off the edge of elevated railways; there will be no little children sent into factories to stunt their physical, mental and spiritual growth; there will be no social outcasts, social lepers skulking along alleyways, physically rotting and spiritually rotten because of the sins of their brothers.

And the coming of this age may not be afar off. By that we do not mean that of a sudden perfection is to be ushered in. We know that there is no absolute perfection except as it exists in thought. We know that God has ordained the Law of evolution, that men may grow from evil to fair, from fair to good, from good to better, and ever better and better. But the Messianic age for us typifies a state of civilization wherein men will have had developed in their hearts and souls the fundamental ideals of morality at least; wherein democracy will be more prevalent, suffering less; wherein war shall exist no more. And we do believe that the dawn of this age is beginning to appear in the Eastern skies. The fact that the worst war in all history is now being waged is no proof for the logic of the pessimist. It may be that aristocracy and war which results from it in part may be in their death throes, and if so, even the suffering caused by this horrible catastrophe is not too big a price to pay. Men are beginning at least to speak of universal peace; men are beginning to practice social justice, paganism is giving place to monotheism, unitarianism—call it what you will. The public school system and the university are beginning to conquer superstition and falsehood; biblical research is beginning to justify the contentions of the Jews through the ages. Haman is at last to be conquered. The curtain is to drop upon another act and Mordecai and Esther are to be exalted.

We Must Take Courage.

It is for this reason that we must take courage more than ever before. At the dawn of what is to prove our triumph we dare not be discouraged. Emerson said that God will not have His word made manifest by cowards; and this applies to a people as well as to an individual. The world is today more than ever before beginning to realize our worth. With the rise and spread of popular education it is coming to an appreciation of the contribution made by the world. We are not perfect, it is true, nor have we ever been. We make no ridiculous claims. But that we have been the great contributors in the field of religious thought as the Greeks were in the field of philosophic speculation is coming to be realized. And now that the dreams of Israel are about to be realized, dare he grow apathetic, indifferent, become noted for characteristics alien than the one that ought to be dominant in him? Contrariwise, let us now more than ever before reawaken the consciousness of ourselves as a holy people. Let us unite, organize, work together with might and main for the attainment of those things that are strictly and distinctively in accord with our traditional mission. Our prophets gave the law of right to the world and we must follow in their footsteps. If not, others will be only too happy to claim the privilege. Long ago, others claimed the privilege; they still are, but if we are to disprove their claims we must do so by our deeds, not by our tongues. We are a priest-people in the last analysis only in so far as our thoughts and our acts and our words are priestly—no more, no less. May Purim be a reminder of what we were; may it awaken in us a new Jewish consciousness. I fear we are losing it only too fast. Binding us as it does to the past, reawakening within us the thought of glorious ages long since past, bringing before our eyes once again the picture of our ancestors as martyrs, reminding us that we are after all the suffering Messiah—the servant of God—may it stimulate within us a deeper love for our faith and its ideals, a keener realization of our mission, a passionate and tender love for our people because they are the trustees of that mission.

The Last Act of the Drama.

Yea, it is more than a reminder of the past. It has a message for us with regard to the future. Down deep in our hearts we feel as our ancestors felt, that the story of Purim is symbolic of our history. Its theme runs through our heads again, and again and again. It breathes hope and optimism and faith—a faith in the ultimate triumph of ourselves because we are dedicated to a divine task; a hope and belief in the ultimate triumph of our cause, when the words of our prophets and seers shall stimulate the sons of men to do the right. We know in our very bones how the last act shall end. Though you and I be not here, we see in anticipation the ending of it all, and it shall be a happy ending. Haman and his plans shall avail naught. The good and the true shall prevail. Yea, evil and his associates shall lead a white mare across the stage, and upon it shall sit Righteousness. And Evil, in his dying breath, shall cry out, "Behold him who the King delighteth to honor." And he upon the white mare shall have the countenance of a Jew, the hated, the despised one; the abomination of all ages. And there shall be a halo about his head.

THE GALICIAN PETROLEUM FIELDS.

The Galician Petroleum wells are of great importance for the national economy and for the warring armies. Therefore the Austrian as well as the Russian military leaders are striving to have the petroleum fields in their possession. It is not out of place to mention here the fact that the discoverer of the petroleum and the first one to use it and to make it available for lighting purposes was a Galician Jew of the name of Abraham Schreiner. This discovery which had an extraordinary influence upon the economic life took place in the year 1858.

NEWS FROM LONDON

BY OUR CORRESPONDENT DR. M. EPSTEIN

London, February 18, 1915.

The war conditions have produced in London a unique thing—a self-contained home for a family of 900 people. Whose children are all these? None other than the children of Israel, fleeing from the hand of the oppressor and the noise of war. Their homes are for the most part in Antwerp. But there are many homes in Antwerp desolate and empty just now. The present masters of the city desire to put pressure on the inhabitants to return. Those who are not back again by the first day of March will have to pay the ordinary local taxes ten times over. Failing their appearance, the contents of the silent houses will be seized. So little do the victors in Belgium understand freedom, they will not allow the citizens of Antwerp even the freedom of being in exile. Large numbers of them have lost all their worldly goods and are refugees in London, and to give them succor was an immediate problem. The greater part are Russian subjects. As our readers already know, numerous hostels have been established all over the capital wherein small numbers of these helpless fellow Jews are under shelter—and comfortable shelter it is. Among the rest the London Lodge Hostel continues to thrive. But excellent as the hostels are, they cannot provide for the needs of the entire host of the wanderers. A communal committee was formed therefore. Mr. Leopold de Rothschild, with the characteristic interest of his house, took the matter up, Mr. Hermann Landau backed up the committee with his usual energy, and Mr. Otto Schiff and his brother Ernest were appointed treasurers. An old workhouse in Poland street was about to be pulled down. The work was stopped; the building was taken over by the committee, and before long some 900 men, women and children were housed and kept in the extensive structure. This is the self-contained home whereof we spoke.

Those who know London will recall the position of Oxford Circus, right in the heart of the gaudy west. Not a stone's throw from that point is Poland street, where the old workhouse may be found. A visitor there would be surprised to note how all the wants of the residents are catered for within the walls of the building. Just think of the kitchen alone! Food for 900 people to be prepared daily! A school has been provided for the children; a small infirmary is there; a chemist's department; a forge; workrooms; a gymnasium; last and not least, a synagogue. But even all this did not suffice for the total number. Another building had to be taken—an old and disused hotel, which is likewise self-contained, though not to the extent of the Poland street institution. Some 600 souls find a home there.

So the Belgian Jews are provided for. It need hardly be added that what the Jewish community has done for its coreligionists the general community has done for the mass of the Belgian refugees. A homeless people, strangers in a strange land—who but the Jew knows so well what this means? But while the community has made provision, and goes on with it, for the Jewish Belgian homeless folk—and it all costs money and means hard work—there is a cry to be stilled from afar. Jews in Palestine are hard put to it: Jews in Poland even more so. The Teuton and the Slav may be compared to the upper and nether millstone, and the poor Jew is crushed between them. Only the other day there was a mass meeting in the East End of London to set forth the situation in Poland in all its horror. Thirty thousand roubles have been sent to Baron Gunzburg in Petrograd and only one condition attached to the distribution of the money—"that the starving of other denominations should not be refused help." A characteristically Jewish attitude, for which we as Jews do not ask for commendation. It is just our way of doing things.

We do not doubt but that our brethren in Germany are acting in pretty much the same spirit. There would appear to be much suffering among the poorer classes in Germany; we are convinced that both the Lodge and Jews in general are to the fore in the work of relief. It is good to be able to feel that we in England are as one with them in this. The brotherly love and harmony for which we all stand must not be forgotten in these bitter and difficult times. But more: It behooves all thinking men to be careful of their words just now. When in the future we look back on these dark days, let us have no reason to be ashamed. War we know raises black passions; good sense must therefore be all the more on the watch to keep them down. We believe that we are voicing the feelings of the English brethren as a whole in uttering these sentiments. Recent communications from Berlin to the pages of the News appear to have overlooked the fact that brethren resident in parts of the British Empire would read them too. They were pieces of special pleading; they could not be otherwise. That we realize full well. But we feel that for us, members of the Order, it is of infinitely more importance to keep uppermost the grand words of our flag—harmony and brotherly love—than to score a small point (whether justly or not) in favor of our fatherland. And so we prefer to dwell on our common work of relieving those in distress—we in England, they in Germany—deploring all the time the accursed war and its misery.

Russia is very much in everybody's mouth just now. Commercial people with a keen eye to business are beginning to talk of learning Russian. Was it not a prominent American who prophesied that Russian would be the language of the future? Military critics again are concerned as to the results of the fighting conducted by Russian generals. But we Jews are interested more perhaps than others, and ours is no material interest. We think about Russia, we hope for Russia—what? A fateful question rises to the lips. Is Liberty coming there with healing in its wings, or are the powers of reaction to triumph as of old? It is much a matter of speculation, a toss-up, so to say. Yet there are those who know Russia well that tell us a new day is dawning in the land of the Tsar. In the current issue of the Fortnightly Review, Dr. Angelo Rappoport puts forth reasons for a decidedly hopeful view of the future. He is not alone in this. No less a man than Vinogradoff, a name known and honored the world over, is of the same opinion. So is Prince Kropotkin. The truth is that the Russian does not dislike the Jew. It is only the governing classes. And there are some who aver that Russian anti-Semitism in modern days drew its inspiration from German sources. It will do so no more.

If this wonder in history will come about, no one will rejoice more than Jews. At any rate, it is a hope. But hope must be joined with action. Public opinion in England is tending towards a better understanding with Russia. Recently a "Russian Society" was formed to cultivate a mutual knowledge between the two peoples. This is hopeful once more. If the Russian Society grows in strength it must of necessity bring strong influence to bear on Russia to give the Russian Jew his due—only his due as a citizen. Moreover, are we to place no hope in the British cabinet? No one can foresee anything in the final arrangement of things. But we do feel that the position is full of hope, especially now that there are two Jews in the British cabinet. If we asked for favors we might be told that it cannot be. But we ask for rights. Surely the British constitution stands for political rights; it must sympathize with those who do not possess them. Certainties? Who can talk of certainties just now? But hopeful possibilities—it seems we are justified in these.

———o———

The Jew who has joined the cabinet is Mr. Edwin Montague, the second son of the first Lord Swaythling, and cousin of Mr. Herbert Samuel, president of the Local Government Board. The new minister, who is chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, has had a very successful political career and his abilities have received universal recognition in the House of Commons. It is interesting to note that in his official capacity the new minister is the patron of some forty livings in the Anglican church. In the circumstances the church patronage connected with the office will be exercised by the Prime Minister. While we are on the topic of appointments, we have to note also that a Jew, Mr. S. H. Emanuel, has been nominated Recorder of Winchester. Mr. Emanuel comes of an old stock, well known in the South of England; he is the grandson of the late Alderman Emanuel of Southampton, who was sheriff and mayor of that town. Finally, we have to chronicle the appointment of a Jew as Belgian minister in London—M. Paul Hymans.

Once more the thought comes to the mind that these appointments are hopeful signs. All fair observers are agreed that the Jews possess gifts. Relgion owes them much; they have produced numerous politicians from the ministers of Haroun al Raschid to Cremieux and Beaconsfield. Seeing that they have talents, why not enable them to be utilized? Surely it is one of the accompaniments of democracy that the state shall be able to utilize the best services within it, regardless of race or creed or color. One of the things that is bound to come to the fore, especially after the war, is that the state may contain differing ethnological and religious elements, and yet be a compact whole. The British Empire no less than the United States of America bears witness to this tendency. Sooner or later the idea will be universal—one of the results of the painful strivings of mankind, one of the landmarks of progress. Jew or Gentile, if he have the necessary capacity let him serve the state. Which is only another way of saying "let him serve his fellows."

In times of stress and difficulty it is the duty of every man Jack to keep his brain clear and to continue his intellectual avocations. "Business as usual" is most appropriate in this connection. It is pleasing therefore to be able to place on record that the intellectual side of the community's work has gone ahead. Our literary societies have had as busy a season as ever. The Presidential Address of the Union of Jewish Literary Societies is to be delivered on March 1st by the Chief Rabbi, with Sir Lionel Abrahams, K.C.B., in the chair. Furthermore, the Jewish Historical Society of England is arranging for a series of ten university extension lectures under the University of London, on "The Jew in the 19th Century." It will interest American readers that the impetus for these lectures came from your own Chautauqua Society, and Drs. Rosenau and Berkowitz will see that their visit here last summer has borne fruit. Nor is activity of this kind limited to lectures. A project is on hand to issue a series of pamphlets reviewing the Jewish orthodox position. The inspiration comes from Jewish members of the University of Cambridge, and Mr. Herbert Loewe is the guiding spirit of the venture. His own general survey has already appeared, and others are to follow. Moreover, a new Yiddish paper was recently published. It is called the "Daily World," is nationalist in tone, and sells for one halfpenny (say a cent). It is significant that the East End should require another paper. The population must be increasing. It is significant that the paper should be nationalist. Does it not seem that nationalist sentiments are growing quickly among Jews? Reliable observers are agreed that it is. In making this statement it is needful to add another. An increasing Jewish nationalist feeling does not mean a lessening of British or American sentiment. The Welsh are keen nationalists; the Scotch no less so. But are they on that account less British? Is not the Australian a warm patriot? Is he not also at the same time keenly British? This note is necessary, seeing that many people cannot yet understand the compatibility of a large citizenship including differing national traits. The ideal citizenship of the future will be of just this kind.

The London Lodge is keenly alive to the need of being ready to plead for fair treatment of oppressed Jews when the time of settlement arrives. Only the procedure is not yet settled. Shall it work alone? Shall it co-operate with the sister lodge in Manchester? Shall both join other bodies? These are questions that require careful thought. What is the most effective method? Seeing that all are agreed that justice is our plea, it is to be hoped that some way acceptable to all views may be discovered. Even the hide-bound Conjoint Committee appears to be waking up. They have declared their willingness to "welcome assistance and advice from any quarter and they will always be found ready to consider sympathetically any scheme of co-operation with other Jewish bodies on questions in which such bodies are specially interested or with which they are specially qualified to deal." This is much, and it is hopeful. For one thing we all desire—a unanimous solid body of opinion. Altogether the horizon seems clear, so far as this is concerned. Some good will and much good sense ought to lead us to our goal.

THE JEWS OF ANTWERP

In the year 1480 a charter gave the Jews permission to settle in Antwerp. The Jews who then settled there were rich Portuguese who escaped from the ensnaring arms of the Inquisition and sought a safe refuge in Antwerp. They established a number of business houses, and spread a net of commerce reaching in all directions. But they were not permitted to enjoy their prosperity for a long time. When the Low countries were united with Spain, under Charles V, the Jews of Antwerp met the same fate as their coreligionists in Spain. By an edict of March 31, 1526, they were granted permission to stay for 30 days only, a term which could be extended. At that time the Portuguese commercial houses of Gabriel de Negro, Emanuel Serano, Diego Mendes and Emanuel Menriques were opened there. As they did not feel themselves safe in Antwerp they emigrated to Salonika. After the Edict the Jews could only remain in Antwerp under the mask of Maranas, or New-Christians. After the peace of Westphalia the government lost all interest in the persecution of the Jews.

The government even protected the rights of the Jews, as the following incident shows:

When, in the year 1682, a son was born to a Portuguese merchant, Diego Curiel, a priest made the attempt to baptize the child, claiming that in consequence of the birth of a child in a Catholic country it must also belong to the Christian church. The case came to trial, and the claim of the priest was dismissed (Revue de Belgique, II., 144, 1871. S. Ullmann, Studien zur Geschichte der Juden in Belgien). In the same session of the Council of State, on April 21, 1683, it was resolved to demand of the Jews not to give "ostentatious, public evidence of Judaism." The magistracy went so far in its zeal that it sought to hinder the Jews from holding religious services. When the Jews held their services on the high holidays of the year 1694 in a secret synagogue, they were surprised by the military authorities and were attacked by the soldiers. But they defended their house of prayer with such bravery that the soldiers and their officers abandoned their daring undertaking and had to give up the plan to close the synagogue.

After this act of heroism the government paid no more attention to the synagogue, and the Jews gained in high measure the respect of the native population. They were active in almost every sphere. We find a certain Curiel Nuez da Costa as agent of the King of Portugal. Manuel Gomez was a well-known physician and poet. At that time Jewish merchants introduced the diamond trade in Antwerp, which is still there to-day in a flourishing condition.

RUSSIAN ANTI-JEWISH LAWS.

Recently the Imperial Economic Society has adopted a resolution memorializing the government to remove all anti-Jewish laws.

The Russian people have been appealed to by the Gorki to emancipate the Jews.

A fine of three hundred roubles has been ordered levied on such Jewish families who had failed to present members of these families to the recruiting commissioners, even in such of the ruined Polish villages where the Jews are nearly starving. The absentees are invariably persons who had emigrated to America some time ago.

The new assistant minister of commerce has announced that Russia, anxious to improve its commerce, does not intend to introduce new nationalistic restrictions. The new minister of education is being credited with the desire of immediately abolishing the ballot system of admission of Jews into educational institutions.

Thoughts and Tidings--A Review of Passing Events

By H. Eliassof

History Repeats Itself.

The familiar adage that history repeats itself is certainly true of Jewish history. The Jewish people have seen their history of sorrow and suffering, of misery and martyrdom repeat itself almost in every age, from the beginning of the diaspora up to the present modern era. Is the history of the Russian pogroms, the Roumanian relentless persecution of the Jews, the world's cruel cry: "Down with the Jew," and the thousand and one outbursts of hatred and calumny against the children of Israel in our times anything else than a repetition of the acts of the rulers and mobs of the dark ages? Truly, the spirit and aim of the Jew-haters and the Jew-baiters of to-day are not much different from the spirit and aim which animated the tyrannical rulers of the unenlightened epochs to rob the Jew of his human rights, to drive him from his hearth and home, and to despoil him of his goods and chattels, or which incited frantic mobs in the middle ages to murder Jewish women and children. To-day, as well as in those times, the persecuted Jew can purchase peace and safety if he is only willing to relinquish his religion, and to-day, as well as in those times, he prefers to suffer rather than give up his spiritual treasures. The very fact that the history of his people repeats itself gives him the courage and fortitude to endure his tears and torments rather than to become a traitor to his God. He is sure that the history of his deliverance and redemption will also repeat itself, for he knows that the guardian of Israel never slumbers and never sleeps, and that He always provides a helper and sustainer in the darkest day of distress and in the moment of the greatest misery.

Yes, history repeats itself in the good as well as in the evil things, and what has often seemed to bring the Jew to the very depths of despondency turned out to be a way to hope and salvation. When the Jews were expelled from Spain the Jews of the world lamented and looked upon it as another destruction of the Temple, but America was discovered simultaneously with the expulsion, and it has already proved to be a new promised land for over two millions of the persecuted Jewish people.

It is, indeed, remarkable that so many points of resemblance can be found between the mission of the Jews of America to-day, in their relation to the house of Israel, and the mission of Joseph, the son of Jacob, the Egyptian minister of agriculture, in his relation to the house of Jacob. The history of the closing period of the patriarchal age relates that more than three thousand years ago the hand of Providence led Joseph, the son of Jacob, to the land of Egypt, placed him near the throne of Pharaoh, permitted him to help to develop Egypt into a land of plenty, and endowed him with the power to turn the course of the stream of the history of the house of Jacob into wider channels. With great dramatic force the historian of the Bible depicts the scene when Joseph makes himself known to his distressed brothers. Their hearts were filled with fear and trembling. They had tasted the bitterness of being falsely accused of crime and they had experienced the misery of being persecuted by the Egyptian government officials. When Judah approached the seat of the mighty minister and pleaded for right and justice, the heart of Joseph was profoundly touched and his soul was stirred to its very depth. He could no longer deny himself to his flesh and blood, and he uttered the significant words: "I am Joseph, your brother and God hath thus sent me before you to prepare for you a permanence on the earth and to save your lives by a great deliverance."

Many of the phases of this history of Joseph and his brothers are now repeating themselves in the life of modern Israel. American Israel, the modern Joseph, is living in the land of peace and plenty, near the throne of liberty. The [illegible] his brothers among the warring nations are full of anxiety and anguish. They drink the bitter cup of [illegible] and taste the misery of persecution by the Russians, the Roumanians and the Poles. Their days are pregnant with [illegible] and their [illegible] restless with [illegible] and dangers. Their [illegible] and [illegible] are in despair. They find no [illegible] and no help in the lands of their [illegible] Providence points to the only [illegible] They look to American Israel as the sons of Jacob looked to Joseph, whom God has sent before them to prepare for them a permanence on the earth and to save their lives by a great deliverance. American Israel must now assume this exalted position of bread-giver and of attainer of right and justice for his Jewish brethren.

The European war has indeed created the most critical conditions for the Jews of Europe, especially for the millions of Jews of Russia and Russian Poland. These Jews hoped that by showing patriotism and loyalty to their native land they would gain an improvement in their political and civil standing in the land which refused them all the rights of citizenship. Many thousands of Jews, therefore, readily answered the summons of the military authorities to take up arms and to fight for the flag of the land of their birth, and many thousands of Jews, who were not summoned, voluntarily offered their military services and rushed to join the ranks of the armies which were marching to the battle fields. As the war progressed the Jewish soldiers of all the warring nations gained name and fame as fearless fighting men. Even the leaders of the notorious Russian Black Hundreds were forced to acknowledge the prowess and the patriotism of the Jewish soldiers. Many of them, in all the different armies of the belligerent nations, found a heroic death in the front ranks of the battle lines or as volunteers for the performance of specially dangerous duty. In fact the Jewish soldiers of all the various armies, the Russian as well as the Austrian, German, English and French, have been praised and lauded by the different military commanders and many a Jewish soldier's breast, even in the Russian army, has been decorated with medals of distinction for extraordinary valor and heroism.

Nearly one-half of the entire Jewish population of the world lives in the war zones, but most of these Jews are to be found in Russian Poland and Galicia. The Jewish non-combatants have everywhere willingly brought the greatest sacrifices in support of their fatherlands in this stupendous war crisis. The Jews of Russian Poland and Galicia have been the greatest sufferers from the ravages of this war. The world knows and acknowledges it, and openly expresses its deep sympathy with these unfortunate war sufferers. Yet, in spite of all these facts most of these Jews can see no hope for any improvement in their political and civil conditions after the war. Here too, history repeats itself. The Russian pogroms continue with the former bestiality. Jewish massacres have taken place in 215 towns in Russian Poland since the outbreak of the war. Wives of Jewish soldiers who have been wounded while fighting for Russia and have been placed in the hospitals of Petrograd and Moscow, are not permitted to visit their husbands because they have no right of domicile in those cities. It is even reported that the Russian Premier said that he was surprised the Jews of Russia should now expect emancipation. True, he said, the Jewish soldiers are doing their duty in the present war, but what else could they do? If they failed to do their duty they would have been shot. The hatred of the Jews by the Poles, who are expecting the restoration of their disrupted kingdom, has broken out into flames. They are excluding the Jewish war sufferers from participation in the general aid distributions and have doomed many Jewish women and children to perish of starvation. They have even delivered many innocent Jews to the executioner by falsely accusing them of espionage. German anti-Semitism still lives and rabid anti-Semitic German papers, like the "Hammer," are still permitted in Germany to hurl absurd accusations against the Jews, to belittle every Jewish virtue and to magnify every Jewish fault. The London Times, following in the footsteps of its business associate, the "Novoe Vremya" of Petrograd, is attacking the Jewish character and besmirching the Jewish name. Neither England nor France, the two liberal allies of barbaric Russia, have so far had any beneficent influence over the Muscovites. The Russian Czar and the Russian bureaucracy are as brutal now in their treatment of the Jews as they ever were and whether Russia wins or loses in this war, the Russian Jews can expect no improvement in their bitter conditions from barbaric Russia. The Russian Jews are shedding their blood like water for their step-fatherland in vain, their endless sacrifices are useless and all their bitter sufferings will avail them nothing. It is now plainly evident that Russia will never grant them the least human right of her own free will. The Russian Jews know that there is now one hope only left for them and that is the help of the American Jews. A strenuous endeavor must be made to rouse the mighty public opinion of the civilized world against Russian barbarity. The Russian Jews are fully entitled to their human rights and by the part they are taking in the world war they have fully earned their political emancipation in every country of the world. They have a right to claim full citizenship in every land and this claim must be brought before the peace conference which will have to settle the fate of all the smaller nations after the war. The sympathy of some powerful neutral government must be won to espouse the Jewish cause before these peace conferences. Such a mighty pressure from without only can influence Russia to change her policy in regard to the Jews and force the other countries to abandon all restrictions and grant the Jews full rights of citizenship. The American Jews are fully cognizant of the facts that by virtue of their exceptionally high position they are the only ones who can undertake to create such an outside pressure and that the Jews of the world hope that the American Jews will readily assume this sacred duty. Surely, the American Jews can be depended upon to do everything within their power to hasten to the rescue of their unfortunate brethren in faith. Here too history will repeat itself and American Israel, the modern Joseph, will prove the deliverer of the house of Israel. As the American Jews are now opening the storehouses of their wealth and are sending material succor to the Jewish war sufferers to deliver them from the pangs of hunger, they will also employ their power and influence for the greater deliverance of their people and to help them to attain justice and liberty in all parts of the world.

Model Citizens.

Judge Clarence N. Goodwin of the Superior court of Cook county recently recommended the great German-American statesman and soldier Carl Schurz, as an example of a model citizen to a class of sixty foreigners who applied in court for final naturalization papers. We all must acquiesce in the high tribute of praise which the learned Judge paid to the memory of Carl Schurz. Nobody can deny that Carl Schurz, the German university student and fighter for the liberty of the German people became a model American citizen after he adopted this country as his new fatherland. He espoused the cause of the Union, supported our immortal Lincoln in his epoch-making policy of emancipation, helped as general to lead the Northern forces to victory over slavery, rose to the exalted position of member of President Hayes' cabinet and became an imposing figure in American history. But we must not overlook the fact that almost all the groups of foreign nationalities who came here and permitted themselves to become absorbed by the American commonwealth count among their numbers many model American citizens. True, not all of them possessed the superior education and the brilliant gifts of mind with which Carl Schurz was endowed. But they have all done their full duty to the country of their adoption and have proven their ardent American patriotism by becoming useful American citizens.

If these facts were often properly brought to the attention of the American public there would surely be less disdain for the foreign element in America. In most cases it is the ignorance of these facts that furnishes the fuel for the flames of prejudice, contempt and scorn which break out from time to time against the foreigners in certain circles of the American population.

DR. MAX NORDAU IN MADRID

It is reported from Madrid that Dr. Max Nordau and his family are at present enjoying the hospitality of Spain. Dr. Nordau is receiving high honors in Madrid from all classes of the population. Recently Dr. Nordau delivered two lectures, one in the Atheneum and the other in the Casa del Pueblo, which were attended by the most prominent citizens of the Spanish capital.

Dr. Nordau spent New Year's eve in the family circle of his friend, Dr. Philip Hauser, a native of Austria, who is a prominent physician and writer in Spain, to whom the grand council of Sevilla has recently awarded a gold medal.

PREPARATIONS FOR THE CONVENTION OF THE ORDER IN SAN FRANCISCO

By Eugene B. Block

Members of the Order B'nai B'rith in San Francisco have risen graciously to the pleasant obligation of playing hosts to the world's leading Israelites who will come here in May to attend the convention of the Constitution Grand Lodge, the highest body of the order.

The tentative program of entertainment, more elaborate than anything of its kind before considered, was prepared by the 1915 committee, which has in charge the reception of the delegates and their families. While this program has not been finally decided upon and is subject to change, it reflects the efforts which will be exerted to entertain the delegates in a manner befitting western hospitality and the high position of the visitors.

It consists of a series of brilliant social events, formal and informal, at which the members of District Grand Lodge No. 4 will outdo all past efforts to show their guests the esteem in which they are held by western Jewry.

The convention will open on Sunday, May 2, and it is expected that the first session will take place in San Francisco's new $1,000,000 Auditorium, which is to be one of the lasting monuments of the Panama-Pacific Exposition. It is here that all of the important conventions of the exposition period will take place.

One of the first social affairs that probably will take place, according to the tentative plans, will be a "stag" luncheon, to be followed by a reception at the auditorium, where the delegates and their families will be greeted by their hosts.

A theatre party and supper have been included on the program under consideration, as has an automobile ride through Golden Gate Park to the ocean beach that the visitors may see the beauties of San Francisco's outdoor life.

"B'nai B'rith Day" will be celebrated at the expisition May 5, and it is expected that special exercises will take place on this occasion. Delegates and San Francisco members of the order will attend the exposition in a body on this day.

One of the most interesting and delightful features considered on the tentative program is a trip to Mount Tamalpais, which, if taken, will show the visitors one of the most beautiful natural playgrounds of California.

If permission from the Government can be secured a barbecue lunch may be served the visitors on their descent from the mountain in the far-famed Muir Wood. It is believed that this would be a pleasing departure from customary banquets and at the same time would afford the delegates and their families an opportunity of enjoying outdoor life of California in one of the most scenic retreats.

"We realize the honor that is being conferred on us in permitting us to be hosts to the Constitution Grand Lodge delegates," said I. J. Aschheim, grand secretary of District Grand Lodge No. 4, and secretary of the entertainment committee.

"That is why we are anxious to excel all previous efforts in entertaining our guests. We are planning a program which we hope will reflect true western hospitality. We realize the importance of the convention, and want to do our share in receiving the delegates and their families and making them feel at home. While the program suggested by the committee is only tentative and still subject to change, it shows the extent to which the entertainment will be carried on. Indeed, May, 1915, will be a banner month in B'nai B'rith annals."

THE MISSIONARY SCHOOLS IN TURKEY

In consequence of the war the Turkish government closed the French and English missionary schools of Turkey. Many Jewish children were attending these schools. The poorer classes of Jews were induced by the missionaries to send their children to these schools, where they were lured away from the faith of their fathers, and influenced to embrace the Christian faith, by feeding the children during the day and by granting pecuniary assistance to their parents. In Constantinople alone nearly 1,000 Jewish children were pupils of these missionary schools, and when the Turkish government closed these schools all these Jewish children remained without any instruction. The Chief Rabbinate of Turkey has therefore undertaken to provide Jewish schools for these children, where they will learn to remain faithful to Judaism.

Joint Meeting of St. Louis Lodges and Banquet. Meeting of General Committee of District No. 2.

Sunday, February 21st, was a gala day in St. Louis B'nai B'rithdom.

A morning and afternoon session of the General Committee of District Grand Lodge No. 2 was held at the Washington Hotel, in that city. Besides the resident members of the Committee present, there were in attendance from other points Rabbi Joseph S. Kornfeld, President, of Columbus, O.; Samuel J. Kornhauser, 1st Vice-President, of Cleveland, O.; Victor Abraham, Secretary; William Ornstein, Treasurer, and Moses Schwab, of Cincinnati, O.; Jacob L. Lorie, of Kansas City, Mo.; Rabbi Louis Bernstein, of St. Joseph, Mo.; Louis J. Borinstein, of Indianapolis, Ind.

There were also present Past Presidents Emil Mayer and Jacob Furth, member of the Executive Committee of the Order, who announced that the B'nai B'rith War Relief Fund contributions amounted to one hundred thousand dollars.

Reports were made of District propaganda work and of other activities of the District.

It was resolved as the sense of the General Committee that there should be employed, by the Executive Committee of the Order, a permanent Secretary on Propaganda, to supervise work of that character, in lieu also of any cash allotments from the Executive Committee to the several Districts for propaganda purposes, and it was further resolved that the purpose and idea of the District Grand Lodge favoring two members of each Grand Lodge upon the Executive Committee of the Order can be best effectuated by the President of each District, during his term of such service, being constituted a member of such Committee in addition to its regularly elected member.

At the conclusion of its sessions the members adjourned to witness the initiation of a class of fifty-nine at a joint meeting of Missouri Lodge No. 22 and Ebn Ezra Lodge No. 47.

The meeting of the two St. Louis Lodges was held at Harburger Hall at 3:30 P M., Mr. Jacob Furth presiding. The initiation services were conducted by a team composed of members of both lodges, Rabbi Samuel Sale occupying the President's position.

The beautiful ritual of the Order was splendidly and most earnestly and impressively given, after which addresses were made by Bros. Jacob Furth, President Kornfeld and Vice-President Kornhauser, and Messrs. Jacob L. Loric, William Ornstein, Louis Bernstein, Victor Abraham, Moses Schwab and Louis J. Borinstein of the visiting brethren.

At 7 o'clock five hundred members of the Order and invited guests participated in a dinner at the Columbian Club. The regular speakers of the evening were Rabbi Jos. S. Kornfeld, President; Samuel J. Kornhauser, 1st Vice-President; Victor Abraham, Secretary of the District, and Rabbi Louis Bernstein, at the conclusion of which Mr. Jacob Furth responded to the call upon him with a short address. The keynote of the addresses, which were of the highest character, was the duty, the obligation, the opportunity and the altruistic achievements of the Order.

Mr. Karl M. Vetsburg, 2nd Vice-President of the District, proved his excellent ability as a most graceful and successful toastmaster.

Intervals between the addresses were enlivened by music and song, the latter set to original words full of appreciation of the Order and its work.

During the evening a beautiful watch fob bearing a golden menorah was presented by President Kornfeld to Past President Harry Simon, as a testimonial to him from the District and as a mark of its appreciation of his splendid work as President during his term of office, to which Bro. Simon most feelingly responded.

The enthusiasm of this, one of the most successful gatherings in the history of District No. 2, was most marked, the inspiration which the visitors brought was repaid in kind by the encuragement they received and the assurance that the day was but a beginning of continued grand work for the Order in the city of St. Louis.

WASHINGTON LODGE NO. 19, I. O. B. B.

Sixty-first Anniversary.

In spite of the inclement weather, the sixty-first anniversary and Purim celebration of Washington Lodge No. 19, I. O. B. B., was well attended. The celebration was held at the Hotel Marseille, February 24, 1915. Everybody seemed to be in "Purim" spirit, even though Purim was not here yet; the musical programme tended greatly to enliven the guests. The following quite an elaborate programme was rendered:

Orchestration, Mr. John Leffler; Introductory Remarks, Mr. Samuel Koffler, Chairman Advancement Committee Washington Lodge; Selections, Balallaika Orchestra; song Miss Sally Sanders, accompanied by Mrs. Frances Goldberg; address "What a Purim Play Should Be," Rev. G. Lipkind; piano solo, Mr. Wm. Goudeket; songs, "Das Goldene Kreuz" and "Le Reve du Soldat," Mr. M. Goudeket; address, Dr. Meyer M. Stark, President Washington Lodge; song, Aria from "Traviata," Mrs. Nathania Anspacher Kalish, accompanied by Mr. Relkin; Address, Mr. Herman Asher, President District No. 1, I. O. B. B.; selections, Balallaika Orchestra.

The main feature of the evening was the address by Bro. Herman Ascher, the newly elected president of District No. 1. In his remarks, which were very interesting, he praised highly the patriotism exhibited by the Jews in general, and especially here in the United States. Bro. Ascher urged more interest to be exhibited in Judaism and Jewish affairs and thought that the B'nai B'rith tended to create such interest. He also felt that the lodges should celebrate the Jewish holidays in some suitable manner. The work of the Order was highly lauded not alone by the President of the District, but likewise by Bro. Dr. Meyer M. Stark, President of Washington Lodge, and by Bro. Samuel Koffler, Chairman of the Advancement Committee of the Lodge.

The Advancement Committee, with the earnest support of the President of the Lodge, earnestly hoped that the occasion of this celebration would be an interesting and entertaining one, and hopes it has succeeded in its purpose.

DES MOINES LODGE, DES MOINES, IOWA.

On Sunday, February 28, 1915, Des Moines Lodge, No. 330, of Des Moines, Iowa, held one of the best attended meetings which it has held for some time. About fifty members were in attendance and seven candidates were initiated by Brother Charles L. Aarons, President of District No. 6, and Edward Sonnenschein, Chairman of the Propaganda Committee of the District. After the initiation, short addresses were made by both President Aarons and Brother Sonnenschein, which were cordially received, and addresses were thereafter made by a number of the officers and members of the Lodge.

In the evening a public meeting was held in the temple. This was attended by a large crowd which completely filled the temple, consisting of the members and their families and many non-members and their families.

Rabbi Eugene Mannheimer, Chairman of the Intellectual Advance Committee of the District, presided, and addresses were delivered by President Charles L. Aarons on the subject "The Needs and Scope of the Order," and by Brother Edward Sonnenschein upon the subject "Present Day Jewish Problems in America." Both addresses were well received, and the Lodge already has a number of candidates who became pledged through attendance at the open meeting and through the enthusiasm of the members engendered by the celebration.

SACRAMENTO, CAL.

Etham Lodge No. 37 of Sacramento, Cal., held an interesting meeting on Tuesday evening, Feb. 9, 1915. Rabbi Michael Fried called the attention of the lodge to the fact that Dr. J. Faitlovitch of Falasha fame will be touring California during the month of April, and suggested the advisability of arranging for a lecture by Dr. Faitlovitch at Sacramento. A committee was appointed by the lodge to make the necessary arrangements.

The lodge held memorial services at Temple B'nai Israel on the evening of February 26, 1915.

WINNIPEG LODGE CELEBRATES B'NAI B'RITH DAY

Unquestionably the most successful B'nai B'rith Day ever celebrated at Winnipeg Lodge took place on Sunday, the 7th of February, 1915.

Brother S. N. Deinard, Rabbi of the Temple at Minneapolis arrived in Winnipeg on Sunday morning and was received by the officers of the lodge and escorted to the hotel. At noon he was entertained at luncheon by the past presidents and officers. In the evening the annual celebration of the lodge took place at the largest hall available in the Jewish quarter of the city. Long before the time set for the commencement of the program an audience of about 1500 packed the hall and galleries beyond their capacity and hundreds were turned away because the building could not possibly hold any more. The Jewish men and women who crowded into the hall represented every walk of life, every shade of thought and almost every age from the young university student to the gray bearded orthodox Jew.

An orchestra rendered selections while the audience was assembling.

When the meeting was called to order the President of the lodge Brother M. J. Finkelstein, in a few appropriate remarks outlined the work of the order in general and the aims and aspirations of the lodge in particular.

This was followed by a memorial service for the departed brethren. The prayer was chanted by Brother Rev. E. Cashdon. The large audience remained standing during the memorial service.

The program included a piano solo by Miss Edith Finkelstein, a violin solo by Miss Gofine, accompanied by Miss Gardner and a song by Rev. Joseph Wolfe. Brother H. E. Wilder, Secretary of our Lodge, read the annual report setting forth the activities of the lodge for the past year and Mrs. M. Cates read the annual report of the Ladies Auxiliary.

The speaker of the evening Brother Deinard received one of the most enthusiastic receptions ever given to a visiting Jew in that city. In an able manner he outlined the purposes and aims of the order, and his whole address was punctuated with repeated applause. A vote of thanks was proposed by Brother Steinkopf and seconded by Brother Levinson and presented to the speaker of the evening by the President.

At the close of the program hundreds of the audience crowded up to the platform in order to receive Brother Deinard's hearty hand-shake.

The concensus of opinion in Winnipeg is that the B'nai B'rith Day was the most successful Jewish affair which had ever taken place in this city. Undoubtedly the whole affair will be a stimulus to the members and an unexcelled propaganda as far as outsiders are concerned.

MOUNT ROYAL LODGE, MONTREAL, CANADA.

An official visit was paid by Brothers Edward Sonnenschein, chairman of the Propaganda Committee of District Grand Lodge No. 6, and A. B. Seelenfreund, Secretary of the Grand Lodge, both of Chicago, to Mount Royal Lodge No. 279 of Montreal, Canada, on February 7, 1915.

The lodge made extensive preparations for the reception and entertainment of the visiting Grand Lodge officers. A regular meeting of the lodge was held in the afternoon, for which occasion a class of candidates was secured and initiated by the visiting officers. At the conclusion of the initiation ceremonies short addresses were delivered by the visiting officers on the work of the Order.

In the evening a public meeting was held in the large auditorium of the Baron de Hirsch Institute, which was attended by several hundred people. The principal speakers of the evening were the visiting Grand Lodge officers. Mr. I. Levinson, President of the Lodge, called the meeting to order and introduced as chairman of the evening, Rabbi Nathan Gordon. In addition to the addresses well known local talent contributed vocal and musical selections.

On Monday afternoon the visitors were taken on a tour of the city and vicinity. In the evening a banquet was tendered them by the members of the lodge at the Montefiore Club.

The visit of the Grand Lodge officers tended to create much enthusiasm and as a result of their visit efforts have been made and plans arranged for the organization of sister lodges in the cities of Ottawa and Kingston.

The success of the meetings was mainly due to the efforts of the President of the Lodge, Mr. Levinson, and those who assisted him.

ARGO LODGE, WASHINGTON, D. C.

A meeting of Argo Lodge was held on February 4, 1915, at the Eighth Street Temple with the attendance of half the membership. This lodge has initiated during the past three months about forty college men who are in the governmental service. Louis D. Brandeis, Esq., of Boston and Washington, was elected a member of the lodge, and it is planned to have Mr. Brandeis initiated with the other candidates now awaiting initiation at the next open meeting of the lodge.

The committee for the annual "Get-together" dinner decided to hold it at the Metropolitan Hotel on March 1, 1915. Brother Joseph Strasburger was appointed chairman of the committee and Julius I. Peyser was appointed toastmaster. The following speakers have been invited to be the guests of the lodge and to give informal talks: The President of the Board of Commissioners, of the District of Columbia, Oliver P. Newman; Commissioner Louis Brownlow; Hon. Wm. E. Borah; Senator from Idaho; Hon. George E. Chamberlain, Chairman of Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate; Hon. Ben Johnson, Congressman from Kentucky, Rev. Dr. Frank L. Rosenthal, President District Grand Lodge No. 5; Rev. Dr. George Solomon, Secretary District Grand Lodge No. 5; and Hon. Simon Wolf of Washington, D. C.

The following officers were elected in Argo Lodge: Frederick M. Pelzman, President; Leon Pretzfelder, Vice-President; David Weiner, Inside Guard; Harry O. Sandberg, Outside Guard; Joseph L. Tepper, Monitor. Hon. Simon Wolf, Rev. Dr. Abram Simon and Julius I. Peyser were suggested as delegates to attend the meeting of the Constitution Grand Lodge in San Francisco. Brother Sol Herzog was selected Editor of the Argo News, the official publication of the lodge.

GULF LODGE, NEW ORLEANS, LA.

Gulf Lodge No. 221 of New Orleans held a well attended regular meeting on the evening of Feb. 24th. The lodge passed favorably upon a proposition to hold the annual meeting of the District Grand Lodge in New Orleans instead of Little Rock and that each lodge send only one delegate. The lodge favored also the proposition to refrain from arranging for any social entertainment in order that the expense of holding the convention may be kept as low as possible.

The most important feature of the meeting was the presentation of a testimonial to Brother Solomon Marx, who for more than 40 years has been a member of Gulf Lodge and who recently celebrated his golden wedding anniversary. The presentation address was made by Brother Steeg, who made brief mention of the work of Brother Marx for the lodge and the Order. The speaker also took occasion to dwell upon the regard for Mr. Marx, which is not confined to the people of his home city but extends beyond its limit and even into the world. Mr. Marx was much touched and in a few words expressed appreciation for the honor conferred upon him. After he had resumed his seat the entire lodge rose and recited Kaddish in memory of Mrs. Marx. Rabbi L. Volmar prefaced the Kaddish with an eloquent prayer.

HOREB LODGE, NEW HAVEN, CONN.

The regular meeting of Horeb Lodge No. 25, of New Haven, Conn., held on Jan. 24, 1915, was unusually successful. A class of candidates was initiated by the new degree team of the lodge and this served as an opportunity for the judges sent by the District Grand Lodge to view the merits of the team, in the contest among the various lodges of the District. The initiation was preceded by the drill, in which eight members took part. The ritual work was carried out excellently.

After the work of initiation was ended, Mr. Herman Asher of New York, who since then has been elected president of the District, addressed the lodge. In his remarks Mr. Asher related his experience in appearing before President Wilson, representing the Order, in company with other men, to protest against the recent immigration bill. Among the other speakers who followed President Asher were Brothers R. E. Hyman and J. H. Ullman, who urged the co-operation of the members and appealed for their assistance in supporting the officers in their work. The evening concluded with a smoker and the serving of refreshments.

HARMONY LODGE OBSERVES WASHINGTON'S BIRTHDAY

An unusually large gathering of the children of the members of Harmony Lodge No. 711 of Bridgeport, Conn., and their friends were present at the public meeting held in the afternoon of Feb. 22d, Washington's birthday, to celebrate the event. Mr. Maximilian Stein, president of the lodge, presided at the exercises and Rabbi David Levy delivered an address on the life of Washington. The program of various forms of entertainment was concluded with dancing and games. The lodge hall was handsomely decorated with patriotic ornaments. The children received souvenirs of the occasion and many prizes were awarded the winners of various games.

LASKER LODGE OF SAN DIEGO HOLDS ENTERTAINMENT TO AID WAR SUFFERERS.

In line with the world-wide effort of the Order to afford relief to the Jewish sufferers throughout the countries affected by the war, Lasker Lodge No. 370 of San Diego arranged for a concert and reception at the U. S. Grant Hotel ball room on Jan. 21, 1915, the net proceeds of which are to be devoted to the B'nai B'rith relief fund. The affair was a social as well as a financial success. The fine array of talent that participated in the program rendered the evening a most enjoyable one from a musical standpoint, while socially the reception and dance which followed the program proved one of the most successful events held in the local Jewish community. Dr. Hyman Lischner, chairman of the committee of arrangements, and those who assisted him are entitled to much credit for the successful outcome of the entertainment .

ZION LODGE, COLUMBUS, OHIO.

Zion Lodge No. 62 of Columbus, Ohio, held a well attended meeting on Monday evening, Jan. 25, 1915, at which Dr. Jos. S. Kornfeld, president of District Grand Lodge No. 2, delivered an address on the subject "Social Service." The newly elected president of the lodge appointed the standing committees for the year. Vice-President Mr. H. J. Schanfarber, as chairman of the entertainment committee, announced that the lodge is going to have the best social year in its history and as a beginning he announced that a minstrel show will be put on in the near future.

On Monday, Feb. 15, 1915, the lodge held an entertainment and dance, which was well attended.

BANQUET OF HARMONY LODGE

Harmony Lodge No. 711 of Bridgeport, Conn., gave a banquet in honor of Mr. Isaac Moss, who has just completed his term as president of the lodge. The affair was held in the lodge rooms and was one of the most successful events arranged by the lodge. Dr. David Levy offered prayer and Mr. Maximilian Stein served as toastmaster, introducing the various speakers.

A beautiful silver mounted gavel was presented to Mr. Moss by Brother Henry Harris. Short addresses were delivered by many of the members present and after the banquet was over those participating proceeded to the Park Avenue Temple, where Dr. Levy delivered a lecture on "Abraham Lincoln."

KANSAS CITY LODGE, KANSAS CITY, MO.

Kansas City Lodge No. 184 is fortunate in having a set of officers composed principally of young men. At a meeting of the lodge held on Feb. 8th the vice-president, Mr. Herman Stern, as chairman of the propaganda committee, announced that special efforts will be made by his committee to secure 100 new members during the year. The lodge has so far 20 elected candidates awaiting initiation and at that meeting six new propositions were presented. The propaganda committee has been duly organized and it consists of 3 members of the lodge divided into ten sub-committees. A list of names of eligible men of the city numbering more than 400 was prepared by the chairman and was referred to the various sub-committees.

The entertainment and intellectual advancement committee of the lodge arranged for a social evening on Feb 22d, which was well attended and proved not only entertaining but instructive as well

OPHIR LODGE, SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

Ophir Lodge No. 21, the mother lodge of district No. 4, within the past few months has set a pace which the younger lodges find hard to keep up with.

Being the oldest lodge on the Pacific Coast it was avoided by prospective young members as a lodge full of old men, but lately this has all been changed.

Within the past few months at least two members have been initiated into our ranks at every meeting, and what has made the other lodges sit up and take notice is the fact that every new member has been a young man.

At the last meeting of the lodge six candidates were initiated and after the meeting a banquet was served and in the speeches that followed the future success of the lodge was assured.

In the latter part of March Ophir Lodge will hold a Dansant to which all the young folks are anxiously looking forward.

JOSHUA LODGE, PHILADELPHIA

A well attended meeting of Joshua Lodge No. 23 of Philadelphia was held on Tuesday evening, February 9, 1915. After the business had been transacted a social evening was spent by the members. Mr. Chas. E. Asnis was the speaker of the evening, his subject being "1812 and 1912, Two Aspects of the War." After the meeting adjourned refreshments were served.

Arrangements have been made by the lodge for prominent speakers to address the members at future meetings and preparations are also being made for a large class initiation to be held in April next.

HILDESHEIMER LODGE, SEATTLE, WASHINGTON.

A novel feature in initiatory work will be displayed by Hildesheimer Lodge No. 503, I. O. B. B., of Seattle as a result of the translation into Spanish of the ritual by Past President Aubrey Levy. Hildesheimer Lodge has in its membership a number of Spanish-speaking Jews, whose ancestors were expelled from Spain in the fifteenth century, many of them settling along the Mediterranean, some on the Island of Rhodes, others on the mainland, including Turkey and other countries. An interesting part of their history is that ever since they have retained their mother tongue and feel proud that they are numbered among the Spanish-speaking peoples.

There are a large number who are desirous of joining Hildesheimer Lodge, and for their benefit Aubrey Levy, with the assistance of some of the Spanish-speaking brothers of this lodge, will render the initiatory ceremony in the Spanish language.

RAINIER LODGE, SEATTLE

The meeting of Rainier Lodge No. 627 of Seattle, Wash., held on Feb. 11, was well attended. In addition to the regular routine work of the lodge two highly interesting talks were made by Brothers Wise and Neider. Brother Wise spoke upon the need of preparing to meet the influx of Jewish immigrants which will inevitably occur at the close of the present European war. Brother Neider, who spent time in the Orient and the Islands of the Pacific, narrated in a vivid way the habits and customs of the natives in general and of the Jews in those lands in particular.

ALEXANDRIA, LA.

B'nai B'rith Day was celebrated on Sunday, January, 31, 1915, by Rebecca Lodge No. 240 of Alexandria, La. In the afternoon a regular meeting of the lodge was held, at which a class of candidates was initiated and the newly elected officers were installed for the ensuing year.

In the evening a program was rendered in the Temple, consisting of vocal and musical numbers. Rabbi Rothstein presided at the meeting and presented as the principal speaker of the evening Rabbi Abr. Brill of Meridian, Miss. Rabbi Brill spoke eloquently upon the purposes and principles of the Order, emphasizing the point that no organization better exemplifies the truth contained in the Bible that "Man is his brother's keeper."

Refreshments were served at the close of the meeting.

CINCINNATI LODGE HOLDS OPEN MEETING

Dean William P. Rogers of the Cincinnati Law School was the speaker at the open meeting of Cincinnati Lodge No. 4, B'nai B'rith held in the auditorium of the Rockdale Avenue Temple Annex on the evening of February 22. The room was completely filled with a highly appreciative audience. Dean Rogers had for his subject "The Individual and the Public" and handled his theme in a highly interesting and instructive manner. An excellent musical program was provided, Josef Adler playing several piano solos, including Rachmaninoff's Prelude in C minor and Chopin's Etude in C minor. Isadore Cohen sang two tenor solos, "Mother of Mine" and "Besta la Guibba." Owing to the absence of Edwin Memel his place was taken by Miss Helen Adler, 'celloist.

VANCOUVER, B. C.

A regular meeting of Samuel auxiliary to Samuel Lodge of Vancouver, B. C., was held on the evening of February 15. An interesting paper was read by Miss Grossman, on "Telegraphy," which was much appreciated. The meeting closed with an amusing story, read by the president, from Zangwill's "Ghetto Comedies."

The second conjoined open meeting of Samuel Lodge was held on February 17 and was a distinct success. The program provided was instructive and entertaining. Two papers were read: the first by Mr. Luckoff, on the subject of "Should the Punishment Be Made to Fit the Crime or the Individual?" The second paper was by Mr. Lang, on "Modern Drama." A musical program was also rendered.

GAN EDEN LODGE, TERRE HAUTE, IND.

Gan Eden Lodge No. 110, of Terre Haute, Ind., has shown much activity of late.

The lodge collected the sum of $500.00 for the relief of the war sufferers, and hopes to raise an additional sum in the near future.

From a social standpoint the lodge has also been most active, having been honored by visits of Brother Alfred M. Cohen of Cincinnati, and Leon L. Lewis of Chicago. Brother Cohen visited the lodge in the latter part of December, delivering an address on the work of the Order, which was very much appreciated by a large attendance present. Brother Lewis made a special visit to the lodge to acquaint it with the work of the Anti-Defamation League of which he is the managing-secretary.

At the last meeting of the lodge, held on Feb. 11th, a general discussion on the subject "What Have We Jews to Expect After the War?" was led by Rabbi Kaplan, and discussed by Brothers A. Herz, S. J. Goldstine, C. Abelowitz, and others.

RIMMON LODGE, RICHMOND, VA.

The regular meeting of Rimmon Lodge No. 68 was held in Temple Beth Ahaba, Sunday night, February 28, 1915, at which time Brother Alvin B. Hutzler, President of the Lodge, presided. After the regular business of the Lodge had been completed, and several candidates initiated, the members heard a most interesting address by Brother H. T. Ezekiel, past president of the Lodge, and one of the delegates to the Grand Lodge, on the subject "The Jews of Richmond During the Civil War." The address was received with enthusiasm by all the members present, and Brother Ezekiel was offered a vote of thanks for his able paper on this question.

At the close of the meeting refreshments were served and enjoyed by the members present.

UNITY LODGE, SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

Unity Lodge No. 273 of San Francisco will celebrate the 38th anniversary of its institution on Thursday, March 11th. The lodge will observe this event with a theater party for the members and their ladies, for which reservations are being made in large numbers. After the performance the guests will assemble at a prominent cafe for refreshments and dancing.

DAVENPORT, IOWA.

Davenport Lodge No. 174 held a "get-together" dinner at the Commercial Club of Davenport on February 23d, which was attended by practically all the members of the order in that city and in the neighboring cities of Rock Island and Moline, Ill. Past President Isaac Petersberger presided at the meeting and in his opening address dwelt on the influence of the order in removing prejudice against the Jew. He introduced as the speaker of the evening Brother Leon L. Lewis, of Chicago, Managing Secretary of the Anti-Defamation League, who spoke at considerable length on the work of the League and on the plans for the future. President A. L. Weinstein then addressed those present and made a strong plea for co-operation of all Jews in the three cities. All the members present pledged themselves to attend regularly all future meetings of the lodge, and to do their best to bring the lodge to an even higher degree of power and efficiency.

WM. McKINLEY LODGE, OMAHA, NEBR.

The Ladies' Auxiliary to the Wm. McKinley Lodge No. 521 of Omaha, Nebr., entertained the members of the joint lodges, at the club rooms of the Metropolitan Hall on Feb. 25, 1915, with a very interesting musical and literary program.

Miss Ella Fleishaman gave an interesting discussion of Mary Antin and her work. The Misses Solomon presented vocal numbers of merit. The story and criticism of the play "As a Man Thinks" was creditably analyzed by Miss Esther Belmont, followed by recitations given by Miss Malvina Newman. Miss Ruby Isaacson gave the story of Zangwill's. "The War God." The program ended with the rendition of further numbers by the Misses Solomon.

Light lunch served by the members of the Ladies' Auxiliary helped to complete what was acknowledged to be one of the most enjoyable meetings held during the present winter.

MONSTER CLASS INITIATION ONE OF THE FEATURES OF THE COMING CONVENTION OF THE ORDER.

A membership campaign for a class of 250 has been launched by the Committee of Fifty of the ten San Francisco B'nai B'rith lodges and will be vigorously waged throughout the city.

The "250 class," as it is to be known, will be initiated before the Constitution Grand Lodge at its convention in May and the honor of coming into the order on so auspicious an occasion is being argued as inducement enough to bring strangers into the fold.

Each of the ten local lodges having elected new officers for the ensuing term, the Committee of Fifty, composed of five delegates from each lodge, met for reorganization Wednesday evening, March 3. New officers were elected and plans formulated for a systematic and widespread campaign for new members.

The "250 class" will be initiated by a crack team and the occasion will be one not soon to be forgotten in local lodge circles.

What Our Lodges Are Doing

INSTITUTION OF B'NAI B'RITH LODGE IN MORGANTOWN, W. VIRGINIA

A B'nai B'rith lodge was instituted at Morgantown, W. Virginia, on Sunday, Jan. 31, 1915, with a charter membership of twenty-six. Considering the size of the community it speaks well for the future of the lodge that it was able to secure such a large charter membership. The ceremonies were conducted by Mr. Isador Sobel of Erie, Pa., Past President of District Grand Lodge No. 3, assisted by Brother E. Hengle, of Pittsburg, to whose special efforts the establishment of the new lodge is due.

ISAAC LODGE, MILWAUKEE, WIS.

An enthusiastic meeting of Isaac Lodge No. 87, of Milwaukee, Wis., was held on the evening of March 4, 1915. The new hall of the lodge was dedicated. The principal speaker on the occasion was President Charles L. Aarons, of the District Grand Lodge, and a class of candidates was initiated by the degree team of the lodge.

MILWAUKEE, WIS.

The Central B'nai B'rith Council of Milwaukee, in behalf of Gilead and Isaac Lodges of that city, arranged a banquet and dance on Tuesday evening, March 9, 1915, at the Hotel Pfister. Hon. E. L. Phillip, governor of Wisconsin, and Hon. Samuel Alschuler, of Chicago, together with District President Charles L. Aarons and other officers, will speak. This affair will be open to the members and their families and friends.

DISTRICT NO. 1

Rev. Dr. Joseph Silverman will act as Chairman of the new Committee on Religious Activities.

Zion Lodge No. 2 anticipated the Purim Festival by a very interesting entertainment. Rev. Dr. Richard Stern delivered an address followed by interesting musical selections rendered by Bro. Dr. L. Lieberman and Mrs. M. Weinstock. Secretary Brother Bernard M. Kaplan gave a report of the convention. Brother Barnard Steinberg acted as Chairman of the evening.

Brother Myron Sulzberger has been acting as President of the Board of Governors for the Home at Yonkers in place of Brother Louis Kempner, who has been ill, but who, we are happy to report, is on the way to complete recovery.

Rev. Dr. B. M. Kaplan, the new secretary of the District, and Brother Joseph Levenson addressed large gatherings of young men at New Haven, Conn., under the auspices of Horeb Lodge.

Several of the officers and members of the General Committee headed by President, Brother Herman Asher, attended the Memorial services of the late Brother Julius Harburger, held at Temple Rodeph Sholem.

Flatbush Lodge gave a delightful dance at Savoy Hall, Flatbush Avenue, Brooklyn, preceded by an eloquent address by Brother Maurice P. Davidson. About 150 guests were present. Several applications for membership were received. The Lodge intends giving such social evenings every month.

Samuel Lodge No. 63 of Brooklyn, celebrated its Fiftieth Anniversary on March 7th. President Herman Asher, Second Vice-President Joseph Rosenzweig and Secretary B. M. Kaplan were the guests at the Golden Anniversary dinner given by the lodge and delivered appropriate addresses on the occasion. Brother I. Trum acted as Secretary of the Committee on Arrangements.

Edward Everett Lodge No. 97 and Washington Lodge No. 19 of New York, held a very interesting joint meeting at Terrace Garden. Brother M. Jablowe of Washington Lodge entertained the brothers by a very instructive lecture on "Jews in the Legal Profession."

Henry Jones Lodge No. 79, through Brother Joseph Levenson and other active members of the lodge, have lately added a number of new members to the roster of that lodge.

Brother Emanuel Stern of Chananiah Lodge delivered an address recently at Chananiah Lodge which was greatly enjoyed by the brothers present. Brother Stern is a very earnest and enthusiastic member of Chananiah Lodge.

Manhattan Lodge No. 156 gave a smoker on Tuesday evening, March 2d. The gathering was marked by a spirit of good fellowship so characteristic of Manhattan Lodge.

Brother Maximilian Stern reports that Harmony Lodge No. 711 of Bridgeport, Conn., gave a dinner to Past President Isaac Moss February 12th, followed by a religious service at Temple B'nai Israel, Harmony Lodge, March 7th. Bro. B. Alexander, Governor of the State of Idaho, through Brother Charles H. Shapiro, has accepted an invitation to address Harmony Lodge in April.

B'nai B'rith day will be observed at Temple Emanuel, New York City, with an appropriate service. Brother Dr. Joseph Silverman will deliver the sermon. The date selected is Sunday, March 28th.

President Herman Asher has circularized the various lodges in the District in the name of the General Committee, requesting them to set aside either Friday evening, Saturday or Sunday before Passover, the 26th, 27th or the 28th of March, as a special B'nai B'rith Day for special propaganda work, when the ideals and the practical achievements of our Order in general and District No. 1 in particular, be brought to the earnest attention of our people so as to enlist their affiliation and co-operation for the good of Israel and humanity.

President Brother Herman Asher is devoting every spare moment to the work of the District.

The Ladies' Auxiliary Society of the Home at Yonkers gave a most delightful entertainment to the old people at the Home on Purim day. Myron Sulzberger, acting President of the Home, Governor M. Minzesheimer, Dr. J. L Blumenthal, and Senator H. W. Pollock made some happy remarks on the accasion. The members of the Home were presented with suitable Purim gifts.

WHAT OUR LODGES ARE DOING.

A well attended meeting of Minneapolis Lodge No. 271 was held on Monday evening, Feb. 15, 1915. The speaker of the evening was Prof. D. S. Swenson, head of the Department of Philosophy of the University of Minnesota. His sbject was "Human Nature and Business."

Under the auspices of Minneapolis Lodge the Intellectual Advancement Committee is arranging for a series of five public lectures, illustrated and popularly presented by authorities in their respective fields of endeavor.

At a meeting of Oriental-Hillel Lodge No. 72, of Chicago, held on Thursday evening, Feb. 25, 1915, Rev. Dr. Jos. Stolz delivered a delightful talk on the subject of "Purim," and at its conclusion a general discussion was participated in by various members.

Senator B. J. Ettelson of the Illinois legislature was scheduled to speak on "Abraham Lincoln" at a meeting of Ramah Lodge No. 33, of Chicago held on Feb. 11, 1915. Owing to public duties which kept Senator Ettleson at the state capital it was impossible for him to deliver his address. The manuscript of his address however was read by Brother J. J. Gusfield and was very much appreciated by the members present. In addition to the social feature of the meeting a class of candidates numbering 14 were initiated by the degree team of Oriental-Hillel Lodge, who were specially invited for that purpose.

Under the auspices of Green Bay Lodge No. 618, of Green Bay, Wis., and under the personal supervision of Rabbi B. A. Daskal, the children of the Hebrew school of Green Bay presented a play entitled "Festival of Feasts" on Purim evening, at the synagogue. A large attendance was present and enjoyed the address of Rabbi Daskal, who spoke on the importance of Purim.

Calumet Lodge No. 502, of Hancock, Mich., gave a Purim dance on Sunday evening, Feb. 28, as a result of which $50.00 was realized and this amount was donated by the lodge, in addition to its previous contribution, to the B'nai B'rith fund for the relief of war sufferers.

A revival of interest is attending the inauguration of the new term of officers of William McKinley Lodge of Omaha, Neb., and special effort to make this the most successful year of B'nai B'rithdom in Omaha is manifesting itself among all the members. Negotiations are under way to secure a Grand Lodge officer to visit the lodges in Omaha some time in April.

The lodge gave one of the most enjoyable dances of the season at the Metropolitan Hall on Feb. 28, 1915.

DISTRICT NO. 7.

The 15th anniversary of the institution of Isidor Strauss Lodge No. 519, of Ft. Worth, Tex., was celebrated on Sunday evening, Feb. 7, 1915. The address of the evening was delivered by Dr. Greenberg of Dallas and a program consisting of musical numbers was also rendered.

Herzl Lodge No. 608 of Houston, Tex., adopted resolutions in opposition to the movement started within the District to dispense with the holding of the annual convention and to devote the moneys usually expended by the Grand Lodge for such conventions for the relief of the sufferers in the present war.

Memphis Lodge No. 35, of Memphis, Tenn., through its president, Mr. Henry J. Lewis, issued a circular letter to the members of the lodge urging them to begin an active propaganda for the purpose of materially increasing the membership of the lodge.

Beth Zur Lodge No. 84, of Mobile, Ala., adopted resolutions favoring the omission of the convention of the Grand Lodge this year.

B'nai B'rith Day was celebrated by Muskogee Lodge No 628 of Muskogee, Okla., on Feb. 28, 1915. Rabbi Blatt was the principal speaker, delivering an address on the work of the Order.

DISTRICT NO. 8.

[illegible] Lodge of Nuernberg reports that nine of its members and a number of the sons of members are serving in the war. Several of the brothers have been recipients of the Iron Cross. The lodge has contributed for the relief of war sufferers nearly three thousand marks.

The members of Eger Lodge of Ostrowo, are active on the committees appointed to render relief to those who have been left destitute by reason of the war. The lodge contributed one thousand marks to the various national funds. Under the auspices of the lodge, a public kitchen has been installed, which furnishes food daily to from five to six hundred persons.

Victoria Lodge of Goerlitz reports that a number of the sons of the members of the lodge are in active service. The lodge contributed fifteen hundred marks to the various relief funds. The ladies' auxiliary of the lodge has taken up the special mission of caring for thirty children whose fathers have been called into the field.

Lessing Lodge of Breslau celebrated on January 30, 1915, the thirtieth anniversary of the institution of the Lodge.

Kant Lodge of Koenigsberg reports that although the lodge is located in the direct war zone, and in spite of the fact that much loss in property has been incurred by the members of the lodge the lodge has not as yet been called upon to render assistance to any of its members. Immediately upon the outbreak of the war the lodge appropriated five hundred marks for the Red Cross and tendered its club-rooms for hospital purposes. Immediately after the outbreak of the war the various Jewish organizations of the city under the leadership of the lodge organized a Jewish war relief association. This society rendered much service to Jewish refugees from Russia. To the funds of this society the lodge contributed 1200 marks. The ladies auxiliary of the lodge has been very active in the matter of affording relief to needy persons.

Friedrich Lodge of Karlsruhe contributed over four thousand marks for various relief purposes. Its beautiful club rooms have been turned into a military hospital.

Rhenus Lodge of Mainz reports that its club rooms have been used for public place wherein poor children of families whose husbands were called to the war are being daily fed. The lodge contributed for war relief purposes two thousand marks. From the members of the lodge fourteen are in active military service, of which number two have received the Iron Cross, and two have been commissioned as officers.

JEWISH PRISONERS HONOR SOCIAL WORKER

Mr. I. Jashenosky, social worker and prominent business man of Columbus, Ohio, who has been conducting Jewish religious services at the Ohio penitentiary, was presented on January 31, 1915, with a testimonial by the Jewish inmates on the occasion of his 65th birthday anniversary. The presentation speech made by inmate Bloch, who reviewed Mr. Jashenosky's services and thanked him and the Order of B'nai B'rith, of which he is a member, for services rendered to the Jewish boys. Among those present and who assisted in the ceremonies were Mr. Jacob Myers, member of the Social Service Committee of District Grand Lodge No. 2, Mr. A. Nassau, and Mr. Paul Karger, superintendent of the Columbus charities, who delivered an address on the work of the different branches of the organization.

BAR MITZVATH AT THE B'NAI B'RITH ORPHANAGE AND HOME FOR FRIENDLESS CHILDREN OF DISTRICT NO. 3.

On Saturday morning, February 6th, 1915, Morris Blum of Philadelphia was Bar Mitzvath at the West Eighth Street Temple, Erie, Pa. Morris was the second boy to be Bar Mitzvath from the Home. The boy received his instructions under Rabbi Currick and acquitted himself splendidly. The Services were well attended and was a great inspiration to the boys of the Home who listened to the exercises. The services were very impressive and the happiness of the boy was a stimulant to all to render every possible assistance for the success of the B'nai B'rith Orphanage and Home for Friendless Children of District No. 3. As in the instance when the first boy from the Home was Bar Mitzvath, Mr. Isador Sobel, the President of the Home, presented the boy with a gold watch and chain. Among other gifts was a purse from friends, the money being used to start a bank account which may some day prove of service.

ANTI-SEMITISM IN BULGARIA.

A strong anti-Semitic movement is spreading in Bulgaria and the Jewish population is greatly disquieted. The press is daily publishing accusations and slanders against the Jews. Never before has the Jew-hating agitation assumed such proportions in Bulgaria. Although the government condemns the anti-Semitic campaign it has so far done nothing effective to stop it.

THE RUSSIAN JEWS IN PALESTINE.

The greater part of the hundred thousand Jews of Palestine remained Russian subjects, as by reason of the capitulation act the Russian consuls refused to release the Jews from their allegiance to the Russian state. They were therefore forced to remain subjects of Russia. The Turkish government being fully aware of the sympathy of these Jewish inhabitants for Turkey, showed its kindness to these Jews in their difficult position after war was declared with Russia, by allowing them to become naturalized en mass and by suspending the legal requirement of five years' residence in Turkey previous to naturalization. Many thousands of Jews were at once naturalized. The reason why so many Jews still remained unnaturalized was because the naturalization fees are too high (40 francs per capita). But while the government did nothing to molest the unnaturalized, the local authorities created considerable difficulties by allowing a short time for naturalization. After the expiration of this time Djemal Pasha, the commander of the troops stationed in Palestine, issued the order to expel the Russian subjects from Palestine. The central government afterwards sent a revocation of this order. But before this order of revocation arrived from Constantinopole the Kaimakam of Jaffa carried out the order of expulsion against 600 Jews, who were forced to leave Palestine and board a neutral ship going to Egypt. It was too late for the central government to interfere in this expulsion, but the local authorities received the instruction that it is the wish of the central government that also the foreign Jews should be treated with kindness.

intercepted by imperial soldiers, and the letters were sent to Vienna to be deciphered. Austria never had a reputation for prompt service, and it may be supposed that these letters were pigeonholed, until some lucky antiquarian discovered them accidentially. There is a great deal of information on the inner life of the Jews to be found in these letters, but we shall limit ourselves to the letter written by Lipman Heller. A relative had proposed to him a match for his daughter. He had inquired about the young man and had heard that the latter had a brother much superior in attainments to the one who was proposed as his son-in-law. He asked whether it would not be possible to give him the choice. There is another difficulty in regard to the dower demanded. The sum asked is 1,000 florins, but Lipman Heller finds that this is too much. He does not wish that his daughter should be married for sweet charity's sake, but he thinks, considering his reputation as rabbi and author that his 800 florins should be equal to the 1,000 florins of somebody else. The social life of the Jewish people has changed considerably, and it is hardly probable that a similar calculation of the values of marriageable young ladies would be made today, though the schadchan who is mentioned as early as the 13th century in rabbinic works, as a man who has to take his risk, when he initiates transactions, is still found in the advertising columns of the Jewish press.

DISTRICT GRAND LODGE NO. 7, I. O. B. B.

New Orleans, Feb. 27, 1915.

To the Officers and Members of the Lodges of D. G. L. No. 7, I. O. B. B.

Brethren:—

As it is absolutely necessary that a convention be held and in order to do so at a minimum expense so that as much of our funds as possible shall be used to assist our coreligionists who are in distress, I have been directed by President Leo Goodman, to submit for your immediate consideration and approval the following propositions:

First—That a convention of D. G. L. No. 7 shall be held in New Orleans on the first Sunday in April, to-wit, April 4th, 1915, and thereafter until its business is concluded.

Second—That each Lodge in the District shall elect only one delegate and that the mileage of said delegate shall be paid from the treasury of the Grand Lodge.

You are earnestly urged to call a special meeting of your Lodge if necessary, and to make your report to the undersigned so as to reach me on or before March 10th.

This matter is one that requires immediate action and the best interests of the Order will be conserved by your Lodge voting in the affirmative.

Trusting to have a prompt and favorable reply.

Fraternally yours,
NAT STRAUSS, Secretary.

ISIDOR STRAUS LODGE, FORT WORTH, TEX.

At a regular meeting of Isador Straus Lodge No. 519, I. O. B. B., held February 2, 1915, the following resolutions were offered and unanimously adopted:

Whereas, Word has been received from the President of District Grand Lodge Number Seven, recommending that a convention of the Grand Lodge be held at New Orleans, La., April 4, 1915, with one delegate from each Lodge.

Whereas, The date mentioned is the last days of the Passover Feast and as B'nai B'rith stands for a deeper loyalty to Judaism and its essentials,

Whereas, A convention with one delegate from each Lodge would be a crippled convention without any benefits,

Whereas, This Lodge has previously expressed through the general committeemen Bro. U. M. Simon and Rabbi Geo. Fox that a large enthusiastic convention would be more beneficial to the cause of raising funds for the war sufferers than the few dollars saved from the expense of omitting or crippling the above convention, and,

Whereas, On account of the distress of our brethern in Europe and social functions usually given for the delegates be omitted this year,

Therefore, Be it resolved that the Grand President be requested to call the convention on the 11th instead of the 4th day of April, 1915, at New Orleans, La., account of this city being located in the center of the District. The convention to be held with a full attendance as previously.

Further Resolved, That the New Orleans Lodges be requested not to make any expense with social functions at this convention.

And Further Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to the Grand President, Grand Secretary, B'nai B'rith News, and the Southern Monitor for publication.

If I Were the Convention

By Dr. EMIL G. HIRSCH

When we were children, we were very fond of speculating concerning what we should do were we President or King. Serious newspapers occasionally deem it of great interest to their readers to ascertain what this or that man of prominence would do had he accumulated a million of dollars. I even have had the momentous and exceedingly important query put to me, though what a million possibly signifies transcends my boldest imagination. It shows the poetic bend of newspaper interviewers that they regard even me in the light of one competent to discuss this utterly improbable contingency. Books also have been written with the caption. One in French and another in German occur to my memory devoted to the detailing of what the authors would do were they cloaked with the ermine of sovereignty. I may therefore be pardoned for venturing on taking my brethren into my confidence and whispering into their ears what I should decide to have done were I the "only pebble on the beach" or in a culinary idiom of American coinage, "the whole cheese" of the convention.

To begin with I should curb the inclination to emphasize the achievements of the Order in the days of its glorious past. When Israel was asked by God for hostages to his fidelity to the Torah about to be placed in his keeping he offered the Patriarchs as security for his resolve to be scrupulous in the observance of God's law. But the proffer was rejected. The thought of this interesting bit of Rabbinic construction is plain. The great men of the past spell an obligation rather than an assurance. Their loyalty and their accomplishments must not be urged as substitutes for the sincerity and enthusiasm of their descendants. Certainly the splendid record of days gone is not a pledge that the days that are give forth similar lustre. True it is, the annals of the Order proclaim valiant devotion to high ideals. The Order had a vital part in the making of Amercan Israel and later in the enspiriting of All-Israel. It carried into effect the self-assumed task of uniting Israel on the broad basis of benevolence and brotherly love. It was a beneficent disciplinarian. The Lodge room taught the Jew to restrain his natural bent toward stubborn individualism. It made him amenable to parliamentary order which after all is in its rules co-operation and co-ordination crystalized in established procedure.

Moreover, let it not be forgotten, that the Order in this land of ours was indeed a very melting pot for the Jews. They had come hither from the four corners of the globe. They had carried across the ocean as luggage but little of this world's goods. But they brought along a goodly portion of local idiosyncracies and prejudices. In the Lodge room the recent immigrants learned to lay aside the petty localisms of the older continent. They were moulded over into American Jews. Besides, while the heat of controversy about liberalism and orthodoxy was intense without, in the meetings of the fraternity the harsh Shibboleths of the combatants were hushed and both Reformers and Reactionaries came to know that of greater importance than the issues their party cries syllabled was the unity of all Israel dedicated to the service of God in the sense in which the whole Torah from its beginnings to its conclusions is Guemilath 'Hassadhim. Much more might be adduced. But the proof is not required. The past of the Order is glorious. And yet I should advise speaking of it in reverent tone, not in the declamatory and boastful modulation which I am afraid has altogether too often been a favorite on our lips and very grateful to our ears. To the order applies as clearly as to an individual the caution, "Let another praise Thee."

EMIL G. HIRSCH

The Order in this generation cannot claim in excuse for present lethargy the Zekhuth Abhoth the merit of the founders and the fathers. The merit will inure to it, but as a responsibilty. That noblesse oblige neither the Jew nor the brother in the fraternity must ever forget. To the glory of the fathers new glory must be added. New situations have arisen in our time. What the founders aimed at and accomplished cannot absolve us from buckling down to our own, and perhaps new, task. Their work must be an incentive. If it is not this it is an accusation. The greater the glory of the Patriarchs, all the deeper the shame of our self-sufficiency and supineness it is. We must not be content to be merely a very serviceable organization. We are this. We have demonstrated this noticeable certainty repeatedly and not least tellingly in very recent months. Foolish enemies of the Jews have invented and circulated the misconception that the Jewish people is an international conspiracy most thoroughly organized for attack and defense. For good and for evil Jewry presents a situation the very reverse of that assumed to exist in the hallucinations of anti-Semitism. The terrible catastrophe which has broken upon the nations of Europe must have revealed among other things the absolute falsehood of this curious suspicion. Our own nationalists also might give their speculations some pause. The solidarity of Israel is far from being actual. Yet there is need for an organ subserving the whole of Israel. Many societies have sprung into being with this in view. None, however, has succeeded in winning the confidence and securing the co-operation of all Israel. And that for reasons which are so plain as not to require further analysis. The Order is the only organization which is so equipped as to fill the function of the International Clearing House of All-Israel. As it ignored the disputes of religious partisans, the sectional suspicions and local superstitions and prejudices when it lept into life, so now it alone of all Jewish corporations is fitted without relinquishing or obscuring a single one of its traditions and principles to rise above national patriotisms and passions and bridge the chasm gaping between the sons of Jacob residing as they do under various skies and marching to the music of differing national anthems. But this function for which the Order is adapted as no other body in all Jewry, and which it has been glad to fill whenever there was call and need, cannot be regarded as the sole justification for the Order's existence in our decade.

Biology is very emphatic in its teachings that organs decay unless there is something for them to do. The fish in the Mammoth Cave of Kentucky are sightless. There being no light where they swim about, the optic nerve soon shriveled away and finally the eye itself was not reproduced in the successive generations of the offspring. Or perhaps the piscatorial population of the subterranean streams never had developed the mechanism of sight. At all events the warning is strong. Only they will live who make their life worth while. What should I urge were I the convention as the one chief preoccupation of the Order during the next ensuing period? It must be a purpose which as yet no other Jewish organization has made its own or for which the others are not as well equipped, nor as free to pursue. It seems to me the Order should aim at constituting itself the moral and spiritual and intellectual aristocracy of Israel. Something of this sort has been kept in view by the European Lodges. Membership in them is a credential of high standing which the best will not disdain and all may well covet. We are to make of our band the elite of Israel, like the Levites in the Biblical scheme of the march of God's hosts grouped around the ark, its bodyguard as it were. But what does this imply? Certainly besides rigid scrupulosity in the choice of the recruits provision for the fostering of all those traits of character which, according to the best Jewish standards as established in Jewish consciousness make up the mental and intellectual and spiritual distinction of the true Jew.

The Order to achieve this must turn the Lodge room into a school of Jewish thinking. The literature of Israel must once more be made accessible as the textbook of true living. Ignorance of our own literary treasures must be made intolerable and the Ben Berith should indeed spurn to rank among the uninformed. A corps of instructors should be developed. This may be achieved if the Order sees to it that scholarships and fellowships be endowed. In the old Kehilloth of Europe by bequests and legacies often Klaus foundations, as they are called, are maintained with Rabbis appointed just to "study." The Order might wisely modernize the institution. In every district such fellowships ought to be maintained. These students could be looked to to visit the Lodges and give the instruction prerequisite for the making of every brother a true aristocrat by virtue of deeper knowledge of Judaism's history, its literature, its aims and ambitions.

The fight on ignorance should also be carried into the very trenches of the common enemy. The root of prejudice always is ignorance. The Christian world has been wilfully ignorant of the Jew and of Judaism. This ignorance is well fortressed in dogma. The universities of the land often are its main supporting basis. Here is work of prime importance for the Order. The fellows under its sponsorship could be commissioned to go and bring the light of their erudition into the universities. Easily in this way the Order could induce the university authorities to recognize the academic value of Jewish law and literature. The suggestion, I think, requires only to be thrown out to impress upon attentive minds the possibilities for invaluable service which it projects. If our fraternity in addition to the things now near its heart were to take up this as its distinctive work I believe the reproach of being a mummy recalling one who long ago was alive will be lifted off it. And new enthusiasm would flush through all of its activities. New recruits could be won all the more numerously when it is understood that none is received except he have in him the promise of being an aristocrat in the good sense of the word, one of the best and by virtue of the best that is in him chosen to be the leader.

Something of this kind I should attempt to undertake were I the—convention.

JEWISH MAYOR EXILED TO SIBERIA.

Dr. Weisselberg, the former Mayor of Czernowitz, capital of Bukowina, has arrived in Asiatic Russia, where he will be kept in the concentration camps for prisoners of war. Dr. Weisselberg was asked by the Russian authorities, after Czernowitz was taken, to point out to them several of the more prominent members of the community whom they might take as hostages, to insure the loyalty of the inhabitants to the Russian Government. Dr. Weisselberg refused to do that, and offered himself as a hostage. He was taken prisoner by the Russians and brought to Russia, whence he was transported to Siberia.

Czernowitz has since been retaken by the Austrians.

Reform Judaism in America

By RABBI DAVID PHILIPSON, D. D.

"Judaism requires only the liberating breath in order to be rejuvenated from within." Thus wrote the great scholar and reformer, Abraham Geiger, fifty years ago. This winged word describes well the course of Judaism in America. Its characteristic notes are liberation and rejuvenation. The reform movement bulks largely on the horizon of the history of Judaism in the modern era. Religiously speaking, this is the most significant phenomenon in the onward march of our old-age faith in these latter days. The great changes brought about by religious reform in Judaism are connected directly with the emancipatory movements in the world at large that during the past hundred years and more removed the civil inequalities and disabilities imposed by mediaeval legislation, and, as far as the Jew is concerned, struck from him the shackles of ghettoism, made him free and gave him the rights of man. The beginnings of the rejuvenation took place in Germany, but the illiberal atmosphere of that land in the first half of the nineteenth century was not conducive towards the broad and unhampered development of any free movement. It was with the insight of rare penetration that Isaac Mayer Wise recognized even while living in unfree and tyrannical Austria that the hope for the rejuvenation of Judaism lay in a land where the Jew was a man among men and where no caste, class, racial or religious distinctions were known before the law. And for that reason he sought these shores in eighteen hundred and forty-six, and from the very start devoted his great powers to the task of giving Judaism an expression consonant with the spirit of the age—even the American spirit of freedom and human rights.

It shall redound to his everlasting renown and the renown of his great contemporaries of the formative years of liberal Judaism in the United States, David Einhorn, Max Lilienthal, Samuel Hirsch, Samuel Adler and others, that they brought order out of chaos and interpreted the religion in a manner fitting to the new environment and expressive of the true inner spirit of the faith. Therefore have they earned a high place on the register of achievement.

What Judaism in America has achieved lies clearly and plainly before us. The past three quarter-century has witnessed a remarkable growth. Congregations have been organized all over the land. It is only a few years ago that the oldest congregation in the region of the Great Lakes celebrated its sixtieth anniversary; a few weeks thereafter the oldest congregation in the far west had a similar anniversary. Only sixty years; the congregations which are older number scarely a score; the great development has occurred during these six decades. The story of this development is in great part, the advance along the lines of prophetic Judaism, the weaving of the noblest traditions of our historic past with the ideals of the messianic future. The institutions which the Jews of America have founded as the visible embodiment of their loyalty to a great past and their aspirations to an even greater future, the synagogues and the theological seminaries, the religious schools and the educational institutions the homes and the asylums; the part they take in all forward movements for the benefit of the commonwealth, Judaism's representation through its earnest men and women in every high cause for the progress of the human race—all these things have given Judaism in America a significance and a standing such as it has in no other country in the world. And I believe firmly that this is due in very great part to the fact that the liberating spirit breathed upon the dry bones and made them live; in America as nowhere else has Judaism had the opportunity of free development. Although mistakes have been made, and serious ones at that, yet on the whole the course has been onward and upward. In contemplation of what Judaism had accomplished in the United States, such men of international fame as Professor Moritz Lazarus, the great German psychologist and ethicist; Zadoc Kahn, France's famous chief rabbi, and Claude G. Montefiore of London, that fine religious spirit, said on different occasions that the hope of the future of Judaism lies in this country.

If this prophecy is to come true, then must the reform congregations of this country remain faithful and loyal to the cause wherein they are enlisted. But the cry has arisen in some quarters of late that Reform Judaism has failed and that [illegible] we must retrace our steps. Such [illegible] the past at the expense of the present. We, as well as our reactionary friends, recognize that the present state of affairs in Jewry is far from perfection. We may even agree in part with their diagnosis of the ills, but we do not agree at all with them in the claim that healing will be found for these ills by setting our faces backward towards an outgrown past. American reform Judaism will solve the issues of the future as it has worked out the problems that have arisen during the past century, the problems of the adjustment of our religious views and practices to the need and the outlook of modernity. Whatever will be the line that the future will take, we, the adherents of the prophetic universalistic interpretation of our religion feel convinced that it will not be the surrender of the high hopes of our reform pioneers, the heralds of our liberal faith, it will not be the despair of the ultimate triumph of the American spirit of progress, it will not be the reversal of our belief in the forward march of our religion and a substitution therefore of the cry, backwards to mediaevalism, ghettoism, neo-nationalism. Because of the very difficulties and emergencies of the present situation we must be all the steadfaster in our stand for the principles of our liberal faith, and all the readier to do and to dare for the final victory.

Yes, in all truth, here with us in America lies the hope of the future. Let us then not lose heart nor be panic stricken because we, the followers of liberal progressive Judaism are now in the minority owing to the great immigration of our orthodox Russian brethren during the past quarter of a century. Time and the American spirit are fighting on our side. As surely as the day will dawn tomorrow the great numbers who have arrived on these shores thus recently will pass through a similar development as did the first large immigration of German Jews. Let us have no fear. American Judaism will not be mediaevalized nor ghettoized, but our brethren who have come from Russia, Roumania and Galicia, or at least their descendants will in time join with us in an interpretation of Judaism that will appeal to their rising generation and keep them from rushing to the extreme of irreligion as is now the case frequently because the form that Judaism has taken in their fathers' homes and synagogues no longer appeals to their new view of life and the universe. This is the great task before the reform congregations singly and collectively. Upon them rests primarily the grave responsibility of Judaism's future in this land.

If Judaism in America is to attain the highest reach then must the Jews of America who have been prospered so wonderfully everywhere throughout the length and breadth of the country rise to the needs of the hour. I have sufficient faith in the faithfulness of the men and women of our American Jewry that at the critical moments they will not be found wanting. The spirit of loyalty to the best traditions of our past and the best possibilities of our future breathes in the devotion of thousands. This has shown itself many a time and oft and will continue to be apparent as occasion shall arise.

Judaism in America, free, noble, aspiring! Unhampered by the restrictions of iniquitous disabilities, equal before the law with all other faiths, at liberty to teach and to preach, to do and to act in accordance with the spirit of its own development, Judaism in this land, to use the beautiful phrase of our American poetess, Emma Lazarus, has "burst her cobweb sheath and flown forth attired in the winged beauty of immortality." Here indeed the Jew has once again risen to the full stature of free manhood; here Israel has come to a new Sinai where God has revealed himself anew in thunderous words of truth and reverberating tones of justice; here Judaism, the religion of the prophets, spring of inspiration of all the religious uplift of our western world, has taken an honored place and come again to its own. As the years pass and the centuries revolve, may the faith of our fathers, growing older only in time but remaining eternally young in spirit, proceed from strength to strength, and continue ever devoted to the truth which has given it immortality, sounding from age to age the mighty watchword of God's Oneness. Thus is Judaism in America but the latest link in the chain. Ages meet. From the hills of Palestine the prophet's voice floats adown the generations, enjoining the soulful command, "Hear, O Israel, the Lord is our God"; from the broad plains of America the answer is sent back in ringing tones, "God is One."

A New Field for An Old People

BY

RABBI JOSEPH KRAUSKOPF, D. D. : : Philadelphia, Pa.

The terrible stories of persecution and expulsions that are reaching us from Russian Poland, are opening up numerous problems with which American Jews will be compelled to struggle at the end of the great war.

Seven million six hundred and fifty thousand Jews dwell in misery where the shock of Russian, Austrian and German arms is greatest. Over 350,000 are cannon fodder in the Czar's armies. Hundreds of thousands are deprived of even those wretched opportunities in trade and industries which were not yet denied them six months ago. Hundreds of thousands of Jewish women and children have parted with their bread-winners—most of them, forever—for a cause they do not understand, and which is not theirs. Slaughter, devastation, rapine, pillage, ruin—this is today the Jewish lot throughout Russian Poland. Even in Palestine, where, in ever-increasing number, the Jewish agricultural colonies were flourishing, even there the back-wash of the debacle is felt.

Whatever the outcome of the war, on whose banner the bird of victory may rest at last, it seems that the Jew will lose. With the end of the war, America will probably witness the largest immigration in the history of our people.

From war-riven Europe Jews will flock hither by the thousands as soon as the avenues of escape will be opened. When they come here, what will we do with them? Shall we repeat the colossal blunder of the early 80's?

To make even the most serious mistake once is unfortunate, but pardonable. To make the same serious mistake twice would be a crime.

When the first refugee rush overwhelmed the small American Jewish community, there were few who knew how to grapple with the situation, and our resources were even less than our knowledge. We know the consequences of that mad rush from the pogroms in Darket Russia. Today the American Jewish community is armed with knowledge and resources. It has ample warning of what is impending.

What is our plan of action?

Are we to permit greater congestion than already exists in the tenement-house districts of all our large cities?

Are we to double and treble our relief institutions?

Are we to build additional tuberculosis sanatoria?

Or are we to profit by the lesson of thirty years ago, and lead our people to that vocation from which they have all too long been barred? Should we not now begin to take those measures which will lead our people "back to the soil?"

Optimistic and special pleaders have had much to say recently about the benign influence that England will exert over her ally in the Jews' behalf. The question might well be asked: will England influence Russia, or will Russia influence England?

I am reminded of the scion of a German-Jewish family, whose speech was tinged by a decided Yiddish accent. The father, despairing over his son's "jargon," sent him off to a village where was not a single Jew, there to acquire a perfect German accent. About a year later, the father went to visit his son, and as he entered the village and spoke to the natives he was horrified to discover that they all "jargoned." The lad's personality was stronger than that of the simple peasants', and had impressed itself on them. May not England's association with Russia in the realm of "Welt-politik" cause it finally to assume toward the Jews the "speech" of Russia?

If at this time, when all the allies are bidding in every conceivable way for the sympathy of neutral nations, the Russian government has not moved one iota from its position on the disabilities of her Jews, and England looks quietly on, what can we expect for the Jews when, perchance, Russia and England will be in a position to dictate terms of peace?

We need not discuss the attitude of the other nations. We know that Germany is the birthplace of "philosophic" anti-semitism; that Austro-Hungary, shamming liberality, boycotts may of its Jews to the point of starvation.

But, after all, six million Jews live in Russia, and the bulk of the impending immigration will be from Russia.

This must be clear to all by now—that, as soon as the walls of steel are down, the rush will begin. We must be prepared to deal with the situation. We must prepare for it now, while we still have the time.

If we permit an even larger congestion than that with which our large cities are now afflicted, the restrictionists, who are eager to slam the doors of this country in the faces of the millions who want to make this wonderful country their home and the home of their children and children's children, will prevail. If that dreadful calamity befalls, we shall have only ourselves to blame, because in the moment of opportunity we lamentably failed.

The Jew is wanted here. Nay, more, he is needed! And there is room for him, not in the big cities, not in the tenement houses, not in the sweat-shops, but upon the millions of acres sighing for human caress, and ready to respond richly to human effort.

There need be no fear that America lacks the room, though we are conscious that American cities are already overcrowded. Large as our immigration has been in recent years, so vast is our country and so sparse our population that, were as large a number as was admitted last year to be admitted every year, for the next two centuries, even then would the density of our population, per square mile, be far below that of European lands at the present day.

England has 428 people to every square mile, Austria 320, Germany 213—the United States has but 22. While Pennsylvania has 140 persons to the square mile, Oregon, Wyoming, Idaho and Nevada together do not average one person. Were the United States to be settled in anything like the density of European lands, it could hold and support a population equal to that of Europe, Asia, Africa and Australia combined. The state of Texas alone is larger than the whole of the Austrian or German empire, and while Germany is obliged to support a population of 60,000,000, Texas, with its more than 250,000 square miles, has to provide for but 3,000,000. Were all the arable land of Texas to be cultivated, its harvest would equal the principal crops raised in all the rest of the United States. Were all the 250,000,000 acres of idle farm lands in the United States to be cultivated, we could feed and clothe and shelter the population of all the earth.

There is, therefore, little danger of our being overcrowded. With all the cry about the millions of immigrants, who of us has been crowded out, whose wages are less, whose mode of living poorer, in consequence of this immigration? Has the cry for labor in the South and West, the cry for farm hands all over the land, the cry for domestics in our homes, grown less? Has not the scarcity of labor rather increased, because of the opening up of new territories, the entering upon new enterprises, the enlarging of old industries, all made possible by the large influx of immigrants?

The terrible plight of our brethren on the war-racked continent is stirring us all. We are raising tremendous sums of money for the relief of their distress. This work must have our whole-hearted support—every dollar raised, no matter how large the sum, will hardly suffice for the great need.

But, we shall be acting in statesman-like manner, we shall rise to the heights of our opportunity, only if, side by side with our relief measures, we set apart a separate fund, as large as that for relief, to purchase land whereon to establish Jewish agricultural colonies—and these colonies may be in Palestine as well as in America—and for the training of young Jewish men to take the refugees in hand, lead them "back to the soil" and guide, direct and teach them to become successful agriculturists—as successful as were our forefathers.

This would be the safest, wisest plan of all—a plan redounding to the greatest welfare of our people and of all mankind. This is the plan for which The National Farm School stands. This is the great cause to which it is dedicated. Nothing short of the restoration of the Jew to the soil—nothing short of this great contribution to progress, will content us.

American Jews ought to make it possible for The National Farm School to expand its work, to increase its facilities, its farm lands, its dormitories, its school and farm buildings, that it may be enabled to serve not hundreds, but thousands, not a limited few, but the whole people.

The National Farm School is eager to be one of the chief agencies of American Jewry for the weal of Israel, as well as for the weal of our blessed Republic.

Brethren of the B'nai B'rith, The National Farm School is at your service. Utilize it! Strengthen it! Better it! Enlarge it! Do for it, and the work it is doing will do for you!

The Past, The Present, The Future

By. SIMON WOLF :: :: Washington, D. C.

The coming General Convention of the Order of B'nai B'rith to take place in San Francisco on May 2, 1915, brings to my mind not only the origin and founding of this great organization, but the notable achievements attained. I have attended, as a representative, every General Convention of the Order; the first in New York City in 1868, the second in Chicago in 1874, the third in Philadelphia in 1879, the fourth in New York City in 1885, the fifth in Richmond, Va., in 1890; the sixth in Cincinnati in 1895, the seventh in Chicago in 1900, the eighth in New Orleans in 1905, and the ninth in Washington in 1910. I am therefore fairly conversant with its leaders who have gone to their final reward, as well as with those who are still living to bless and to aid the great work for which the Order stands sponsor.

It is the brightest page in American Jewish history when four German immigrants, who had become American citizens, conceived the lofty idea of organizing the society that should prove not only a benefit to the individual members, and not only to the Jewish, but to the entire community. Contrary, possibly, to the spirit and genius of American institutions, it was to be a secret society—not that they had anything to conceal, not that they desired to make it sectarian, as between neighbor and neighbor, but simply in the spirit of education, knowing that under the then existing conditions in a greater portion of Europe, and which unfortunately exists in a part thereof today, the Jew as a man and citizen had been so ostracised and naturally so bent under the yoke of oppression, that they needed the friendly advice and helping hand of their own co-religionists, within closed doors, where their jargon, or the lack of a knowledge of the English language, would be no bar or hindrance to their advancement, either in social or civic life. In other words the lodge room became a night school for young and old, and from its sacred precints have gone out into the world, men of the highest prominence in the respective communities of the Republic. Men who have been leaders, not only in Jewish communal life, but who have been at the forefront of every duty that constitutes American citizenship. It was not only a school, it was also the synagogue and temple, where the purest and most elevating ideals of Judaism were instilled, and in addition thereto, patriotism with all its obligations and opportunities was spoken in eloquent words in the presence, not of any foreign or sectarian emblem, but of the American flag with all its inspiring stripes and stars. From a financial standpoint, thousands of men when stricken with sickness or misfortune were aided by their Lodges and Grand Lodges. Hundreds of thousands of widows and orphans were cared for, either by means of the endowment fund, or by having homes and asylums for the aged and the helpless children, in which they found welcome refuge, and from which men and women have gone out into the world of activity, thoroughly equipped for the battles of life. Some of the most noted and eloquent Rabbis of our time were thus reared in orphan asylums, founded, endowed and supported by the Order of B'nai B'rith.

The Order has also endowed, and annually contributes to the support thereof, the National Jewish Hospital for Consumptives, situated at Denver, whose motto is "a free hospital for poor consumptives, irrespective of nationality or creed." The highest possible tribute that can be paid to any human work.

It has also endowed, and pays annual contributions to the Leo N. Levi Memorial Hospital, situated at Hot Springs, Arkansas—another of those human benefactions for which the Order has worked zealously and humanely ever since the creation of the organization.

From a sentimental and patriotic standpoint, the Order of B'nai B'rith is the only organization, whether Jewish or Christian, that has ever given to the United States a monument dedicated to Religious Liberty. It is now standing as a work of genius by a brother of the Order, Sir Mosely Ezekiel, at Fairmont Park, Philadelphia, and nothing so symbolizes American institutions and the recognition of the sacred obligation that each and every citizen owes to those institutions, especially the Jew, as that great work of art.

Again when the cry from Roumania came, it was a past-president of the Order, who had contributed his brawn, brain and money to the betterment and growth of the organization, Benjamin Franklin Piexotto, who was sent by President Grant to Bucharest as a messenger of peace and good will, and who accomplished such splendid work in that mission, and it was the Order of B'nai B'rith that twice came to his financial support, each and every lodge in the United States contributing generously to make that mission a possibility. And time and again when the cry of distress or persecution rang through the world, the Order responded promptly and generously. This culminated in the celebrated Kishineff petition, under the leadership of its then president, Leo N. Levi, which is still regarded by the entire world as a document worthy, as John Hay, secretary of state, so aptly said, of being not only placed within the archives of the State Department, but of being transmitted to future generations as an example of an undying principle, and a vindication of the patriotism of the American Jews, as represented by the Order of B'nai B'rith.

But independent of all these splendid contributions to the history of our time, the Order did not stand still. It had ambitions. It recognized the golden moment to build still greater monuments, and thus the Order came into being in Austria, Germany, Roumania, the Holy Land, in England, Switzerland and Denmark, making it an international body, and only those who are cognizant of what has been achieved in Europe and Asia by and through the Order, can have any adequate conception of what has been and is being done to alleviate, to aid, to strengthen, to educate, and to bring into closer touch, all elements of Jewry, whether Orthodox, Reform or Zionistic. It has more than realized the altruistic dreams of its founders, and is at this present moment, in the most crucial hour of the world's history, an important and dominant factor in bringing to the suffering and stricken of our faith, not only kind words, but substantial aid, and in doing so, emphasizes the ethics and vindicates the principles on which and for which the Order has been created and has battled during the whole of its existence. No calamity, whether in the United States or elsewhere, has been unheeded by the Order. Prompt and generous support has been given, and while doing this as members of this great organization, it has never forgotten either in its individual or concrete form, to recognize the other duties as Jews, as citizens, and even as members of kindred organizations, thus demonstrating that in every form of philanthropy, there is no such word as creed or nationality. The founders and those supporting them in authority, are no longer in our midst to see the great structure rise to the eminent position it now occupies, but what they did is embalmed in the history, not only of the Order, but of our common country, and their names will go down in the ages as heroes who battled, not on the fields of carnage, but on the fields of peace and humanity. Henry Jones and his compeers, the founders; Benjamin Franklin Peixotto, the statesman and orator; Julius Bien, who for thirty-three years guided the ship so admirably and successfuly, and whose attainments, the scientific world recognized in many of its World's Expositions; Leo N. Levi, whose untimely death is still a source of the keenest sorrow; Adolf Kraus, who has given the best years of his life for the development, for the constructive work, for the broadening liberal ideas that dominate the era, whose unselfishness and devotion are a marvel to his best friends, a man of the most fearless independence, accurate judgment, sober and sane thought and who has proven the right man in the right place.

And now with all these glorious pages of national and international history—what of the future? Can there be any doubt as to that? Is the Order not growing in the spirit of its founders? Has it not illustrated by work unselfishly done that it is worthy of the trust and confidence of the general community? Is it not raising and elevating the standard of true and progressive Judaism? Is it not coming to the help of those who need our support, our advice, and our unselfish friendship? Is there any reason why in the future, the Order should not claim, not only for its continued existence, but for its generous recognition, the support and strengthening co-operation of American and European Jewry? The Order is not a self-speaking body. It does not arrogate to itself, supreme control in any direction. It forms only one great constituent body of citizenship that dares to do right, that fears not criticism, and that while recognizing other organization, and we constitute ourselves as trustees of a sacred mission that has not only borne fruit in the past and in the present, but which will ripen to still greater vintage in the days yet to come. I glory in having been an humble participant in the great caravan that has made pilgrimage to the altar of humanity, and I can conceive of no prouder title to be inscribed on the stone that shall mark the last resting place than "He was a member of the great Order of B'nai B'rith—a body of men that gave life and emphasis to American Jewry, that has stood before the President and cabinet in council; that has founded homes, asylums and hospitals, trade and technical schools; that created missions of humanity; that stood against tyranny; that made a gallant fight against the defamation of the Jew—in short, a body of civic soldiers who fought in serried ranks, and will forever fight against prejudice, wrong and oppression."

In conclusion I cannot but repeat in part what I stated in an address at the banquet given to District Grand Lodge No. 5, during their annual meeting in Washington in April, 1913: "The B'nai B'rith as an international factor is not a mere phase, but a living reality, and to have reached this potential epoch, we must naturally trace the history of this great humanitarian organization. Briefly then, its founders were German immigrants, who with prophetic vision, saw and grasped the golden opportunities that this Republic afforded, and therefore founded an order composed of Jews, who, while true and loyal to the faith of their fathers, would at the same time evidence their devotion and patriotism for the country of their birth and adoption. Citizenship based on equality, assimilation on civic lines without abandonment of their faith, was made the "Leit Motif" of their platform; to educate the alien, to encourage the striving, to aid and assist the sick, the widow and orphan, to worship and adore the flag of the Republic, were the foundation stones of this new Temple of Humanity.

"The Jew, wanderer for centuries, by the humanizing process inspired by the Order, became in due time a full fledged American citizen, and it is in this lofty spirit we salute and greet you tonight. Great and beneficient as has been our past, we are battling for greater principles today. The world is in a state of revolutionary unrest, and it well behooves the people of the Bible and the Ten Commandments,, the people of sobriety and conservatism, to lead the advance for righteousness, justice and equal rights. In this spirit of brotherhood the Order was planted in Europe and Asia, becoming a vitalizing factor, bearing the wireless message of hope and peace, from the great Republic of the West to the Nations across the sea. With the aid of the leaven of our brain and soul activity, we have kneaded these masses of men, who are still suffering the sting and arrows of persecutions, into a living product. They look to us and our God given institutions for succor and relief and their fondest hopes will not be disappointed. From the days of the immortal Washington to this fateful hour, our Government has never proven recreant to the great trust.

"The Order of B'nai B'rith is an organization striving to bring into closer communion all shades of Jewish thought, to the end of bettering the condition of all men irrespective of faith.

"We are keeping pace, as an organization, with the giant strides of the Republic. As Byron woke up and found himself famous, so we, since 1898, have been awakened from our Rip Van Winkle sleep, and today our influence at home and abroad is most potent.

"Our fleets, circle the world, bringing messages of cheer and hope, and the future, rich in promise, will bring still greater opportunities to the end of dispelling prejudice at home and abroad and harmonizing into one grand uplift the United States of America—God bless it."

The Cult of Efficiency

By Rabbi Henry Cohen, Galveston, Texas

The whole trend of our latter day education, and I use the term education in its broadest sense, points to the value of efficiency. It is the laggard who makes no progress, as it is the adept who stands at the head. The inefficient man in any profession can exist only so long as his inefficiency is not noticed, or until he can be replaced. The average man does average work—hence he is an average man.

I need not assure my readers that this is true in all walks of life, even in those not apparent to the cursory onlooker. To such an extent is this an eternal verity that efficiency has been termed a cult, not in the exact sense of the word, but in the sense that the cultivation of skill is a prerequisite to reaching heights of expertness and depth of exactness. The Biblical adage has it, "Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might."

There is no trade, profession or business in life but what efficiency is desirable, yea, imperative.; The locomotive engineer, with his hand at the throttle, has a thousand lives within that very hand. The common, ordinary, every-day elevator attendant would take his toll of human mishaps, were he not competent in the simple art of holding the wire cable as it should be held; and thousands of lives have been sacrificed by the blundering chauffeur. I have but spoken of the machinery of motion, the common carriers of mankind. The sedentary occupations of life also need the proficient worker. The man at the desk, the cashier at his till, the bookkeeper at his ledger, the shipping clerk at the warehouse and the freight handler at the depot. Nowhere is the lack of ability more noticeable than in the commercial side of life, and because of this lack, wherever it exists, the wheels of barter become clogged, to the detriment of the whole of the commercial system.

The improper placing of a comma has often altered the sense of a whole sentence, and the telegraph companies have been mulcted of heavy damages for the common mistakes of its employees. In the writing of books, the postulating of theories, in the development of philosophies of the problems of the day, efficiency plays a peculiar part; we find, because one generation has not been thoroughly qualified for its work, the next generation must reverse it, alter it, or entirely undo it. Because a philosopher of the eighteenth century generalized, making sweeping statements here and there, his successors of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries must rectify his work.

I am now referring to those sciences that depend upon the passage of time for their unraveling—for the world was flat until time proved it to be round—I am not now referring to those philosophies that can only be taught as the centuries develop—those built upon human endeavor, the experience to be gathered from every age—I refer to the ideas incorrectly thought out, carelessly worked over, haphazardly given to the Universe, conjecture taking the place of truth and feebleness of power! Many a splendid dream of art or science has been marred by inefficient handling, to the detriment of the whole cause.

Since it is so well known that large bodies of men are swayed by smaller ones and these in turn are influenced by individuals, the need of the adequacy of the work of the smaller in relation to greater, or of the individual to the aggregation, at once becomes apparent. The silver-tongued orator that sways an audience must be exact in his statements and correct in his diagnosis, if he wish his theme to make a real and lasting impression. The skill of the physician is the touch-stone of the usefulness of one portion of mankind for another. The reasonable interpretation of the law by the attorney is proof positive, not only of that particular advocate's intellect, but of the high estimation in which the science is held by civilization. The efficacious life of a minister of religion is a guarantee of the usefulness of his profession and the consequent influence of his ministry.. Schools, colleges, universities, extension movements along educational lines, need able expounders, or the usefulness of these institutions becomes stultified.

In all works of life the same tale is told; exactness or aptness win the day, make for better things, and lead in all lines. Many a man has been wrecked on the shoals of misfortune, material and intellectual, because of an insufficient understanding of the theory of adequacy, and as time passes more stress than ever will be put upon competency. No greater lesson can be taught to the young man or woman of any trade, profession, or vocation than this: the problems of civilization are so complex that the cult of efficiency is at once a prognostication of the result of the work in hand, and a sure test of the work of its author. We do not always reach the heights we would.

"Our largest hope is unfulfilled,
  The promise still outruns the deed,
The Tower but not the spire we build.

"Our whitest pearl we never find,
  Our ripest fruit we never reach,
The flowering moments of the mind
  Drop half the petals in our speech."

Must we, therefore, be content to plod along in unquestioning lines, to reproduce our kind, like ourselves or worse, with no thought for our betterment or for the betterment of the coming race? Or shall we not rather fit ourselves to do our share of life's work in such manner that the generation that succeeds us will be abler and stronger? Be efficiency our aim and target!

A RUSSIAN INQUIRY ON THE JEWISH PROBLEM.

The eminent Russian writers, MM. Gorki, Andreyeff, and Sologub, have addressed an inquiry on the Jewish problem to all Russian authors, notables, statesmen, aritsts and scientists. They asked for answers to the question whether anti-Semitism had been imported into Russia from the West, and whether the anti-Jewish laws had a bad influence on the culture and commerce of Russia. They also invited views on the influence of the Jews in Western Europe on art, science, and public life, and on the best method of arresting racial hatred. They intend to publish the replies in a volume, which will be utilized in the campaign for the emancipation of the Jews.

THE SIGNIFICANCE of the STUDENT SYNAGOGUE MOVEMENT

By RABBI LEO M. FRANKLIN - - Temple Beth El, Detroit

Pessimism is something of a habit. Men accustom themselves to singing a dirge of lamentation about existing things and then they persuade themselves that there is no help for today and no hope for tomorrow. Moreover, the pessimistic spirit is contagious. One cries that the world is going to the bad and immediately a mighty chorus take up the doleful note. Nowhere perhaps has this tendency better illustrated itself than in the domain of our present Jewish life. It is true, he would be foolish who would have the temerity to assert that with the Jew all things are as they should be. Blind indeed must that student of our situation be who is not struck by the apathy and the indifference that abounds in many quarters. Those of us whose lives are consecrated to the furtherance of the ideals for which the Jew and Judaism have stood through centuries, cannot honestly be buoyant at the conditions which an intelligent survey of Jewish life in America reveals. Nor can it comfort us to any great degree to be reminded that our situation is not dissimilar to that of other religious denominations. If the decay of religion is general, so much the more bitter is our plight. If men are so sunken in the slough of materialism that the call of the spirit means nothing to them, then must the Jew confess that all the sufferings that he has endured through countless centuries for the sake of an ideal, have counted for little. And that confession, I, for one, do not care to make. I do not believe that it is founded in fact. I believe that even if the church has in large measure failed, the inference is not justified that the cause of religion has proved itself a failure. I may see as clearly as any that prevailing conditions are not such as to rejoice the heart of the idealist, and yet need not believe that all is lost. I may find myself confronted on every hand by the most rabid materialism, and skepticism and disloyalty, and yet I need not sacrifice my optimism. The essential difference between the pessimist and the optimist lies in this very fact. The pessimist is he who, seeing the evil that abounds, believes that there is no power in man to overcome it. The optimist, on the other hand, is he who equally alive to the untoward conditions that exist, yet has a firm faith that in man is the power to prevail against them if he so wills to do.

Now, it seems to me that it is because the pessimistic rather than the optimistic spirit has been dominant in these last years in our Jewish life, manifesting itself in the utterances of our rabis, of our platform orators, and in the Jewish press, that we have rather lost our perspective and so have actually been blind to many of the signs that are really full of hope and promise. Because many attempts, some of them ill considered and some of them inadequately carried out, have failed to restore the enthusiasm of the Jew for his ancestral faith, we have leaped to the conclusion that for us there is no salvation. To this conclusion the practically empty synagogues in many communities, the lack of Sabbath observance almost everywhere, the dropping of ceremonial practices in the home, the increasing number of mixed marriages, and most of all the slipping away of our young men and our young women from their ancestral faith, have all contributed corroborative evidence. When on rare occasions the note of hope has been sounded, it seems to have been feeble and forced. Few have been our leaders who have had the courage born of honest conviction to proclaim that all is well with the Jew. For one, I have always felt that many of the discouraging conditions by which American Israel finds itself confronted could be overcome if our problems were properly attacked. Nay, I have a deep rooted conviction that our very cry of despair has led not only to a distorted perspective, making our condition seem [illegible] than it actually is, but has conduced as well to an actual atrophy of our power to make things better.

I had observed as clearly as others the distressing fact that a large proportion of our younger men and particularly of the educated classes had little or nothing to do with the synagogue or its institutions. Indeed, many a boy who had left his home city to attend college, returned, after his four years of study a skeptic, a scoffer or a cynic. With all that he had learned at college, he had unlearned his religion. What was the pernicious influence at work to accomplish such a result? It needed no extraordinary clear insight to answer the query. The years of a man's college career are, from the standpoint of his Jewish life, perhaps the most crucial. Away from his home surroundings and from the influences of organized religious life, he finds himself suddenly thrust into a community where more than ever before he represents a minority class. Say what one will to the contrary, and deplore it though we may, the spirit of our great educational institutions in this country is dominantly Christian. Whether this should be so or not is beside the present argument. Perhaps there is some justification for the fact. But justification or not, your Jewish young man finds himself suddenly thrust into an atmosphere that is strange to him. He feels himself outside the circle of his fellow students. If they have not their church home in the university center, at least they are not unchurched, as to all intents and purposes he is. Nor, however nonchalantly he may accept his distinctive religious situation, is he permitted to remain altogether unmindful of it. Because he is a Jew, the fraternities—though this is by no means an unmixed disadvantage—refuse to accept him into membership. He is made conscious in more ways than one of the fact that he is "different." As a result of this the Jewish college student sinks in his own esteem and begins to feel as Heine put it, that "Judaism is not a religion, but a misfortune." What more natural, under the goad of such a feeling than that he should turn his back upon things Jewish and lapse, not indeed into Christianity, but what is far more to be deplored, into atheism, skepticism and denial?

Another influence of an entirely different kind, making for the same end, is the opening to the student of entirely new fields of intellectual activity. In college he gets his first taste of science and philosophy, and because some of the theorems enunciated from the professor's chair seem to contradict and to invalidate the preachment which he has, through his youth, heard from the pulpit of the synagogue, he at once accepts the conclusion, illogical though it be, that religion is not in harmony with the pronouncements of science and philosophy, and that, therefore, for him, religion must go by the boards.

Until a very recent time preachers and communal leaders among the Jews were content to accept with the utmost complacency the situation as thus outlined, regarding it as almost inevitable that the young man and the young woman who should be sent to college would be lost to any active interest in synagogal or even Jewish matters after their graduation. It was a notorious fact, accepted not without some distress indeed, that the professional men among the Jews were, as a class, less loyal than most others to their religious obligations. As a result, preachers and writers in the Jewish press libeled the Jewish college student by saying that once emancipated from his ignorance in regard to secular matters, he could by that token no longer be counted upon to maintain an interest in things Jewish. ,

The only way in which this pessimistic theory could be overcome was by an aggressive handling of the situation and of actually testing out the real attitude of the Jewish student. Attempts were made to organize the Jewish students in our colleges into Jewish fraternities, always with the plea that since they could not be admitted into existing fraternities, they must in self defense form similar organizations of their own. The short-sightedness and unwisdom of such a policy should, of course, have been immediately apparent. For when all is said and done, it is true here as elsewhere that he who defends himself accuses himself. The Jew has nothing to hide; there is no reason in heaven or earth why as Jews any body of students should organize themselves into a secret society.

To discuss in detail the mischievous results that in general are accredited, by competent authorities, to fraternity life is not my purpose, but it may be said without fear of successful contradiction that though here and there the Jewish fraternity may bring about an "esprit du corps" among a limited number of young men banded together under the goad of a worthy ideal, on the whole the influence of the Jewish fraternity is unwholesome.

The establishment of the Menorah Society in a large number of our Jewish college centers was undoubtedly a step to be commended, and too much praise cannot be given to the leaders of this splendid movement for what has already been accomplished by them and for the promise that the future holds. But after all, the Menorah Society is frankly created for the furtherance of Jewish culture and the study of Jewish literature. With the religious life of the Jew, except in so far as through a knowledge of our literature we become better Jews, the Menorah Society has no direct concern. What was needed to win back to the faith of our fathers our Jewish young men was that a new emphasis should be laid upon the religious side of Judaism. Whether or not all agree that the mission of the Jew is solely and wholly a religious one, none can fail to give assent to the proposition that of the Jew's religious life, the congregation is the one logical and legitimate representative. Upon this basis was established in February, 1914, at Ann Arbor, the Jewish Student Congregation of the University of Michigan. It was the first organization of its kind in this country, though a Jewish student congregation has for some years existed in the University of Cambridge, England. It was organized not in opposition to any existing institutions, but with the distinct purpose of supplementing and in some sense of further inspiring the legitimate activities of such organizations as the Menorah Society. To the credit of both these organizations, let it be said that they have worked in completest harmony and to their mutual good. But the Congregation has been successful beyond the most expectant dreams of its promoters. Week after week large numbers of young men and women assemble in MacMillan Hall for worship, and to hear preached to them by men who may speak with the authority of knowledge, the message which the Jew and Judaism have for the men of today. It may be said without exaggeration that perhaps nowhere does there assemble week by week a more reverent and devout congregation than that of the Jewish Student Congregation of the U. of M. The services are conducted and the sermon preached by representative rabbis who, for this single purpose, journey week by week from their homes to Ann Arbor; and of all who have enjoyed the privilege of occupying this "Student Pulpit," there is not one who has not reported an enrichment of his own life through the experience. As a result of the existence of this Congregation, the Jewish students at Ann Arbor no longer feel themselves in a class by themselves. They, too, like others, have their church organization, and to be a Jew is no longer a thing to be hidden by them, but a matter to be proclaimed with decent pride.

The organization of this Jewish Student Congregation at the U. of M. has led to large results, among them the holding in Hill Auditorium on February 21st of the current year of a great Jewish service for which all other churches in the city of Ann Arbor closed their doors. It is unlikely that there has ever before been held a service like this—a Jewish service attended by approximately five thousand men and women of all faiths, and among them literally thousands of eminent professors and students who, because of this service, will, through their lives hold the Jew in greater esteem than before seemed possible to them.

But most of all this congregation has proved that the belief that the educated Jew has no interest in Judaism is absolutely false. It has justified the position of the optimist who holds that however discouraging conditions may be, they may be counteracted if approached from the proper angle. The Student Congregation at Ann Arbor has blazed the way for similar organizations in other universities. It it likely that their number will grow very rapidly and as this becomes true, it is safe to predict that the educated man will become the intenser Jew, and that he who heretofore was a negligible quantity in our affairs, will become a most important factor.

BETTER UNDERSTANDING BETWEEN JEWS AND POLES.

A conference was recently held in Petrograd between Russian and Polish progressives to discuss the Jewish problem. Maxim Gorki was the principal speaker at the conference and his plea on behalf of the Jews was received with much enthusiasm. It appears that the Poles, especially the more progressive among them, are beginning to realize that it would not pay them to incur the disfavor of the more liberal Russians. The statement issued recently by Professor Milyukov that if the Poles do not treat the Jews with more consideration they are not deserving of the gift of autonomy had the desired effect. The Polish press is beginning to employ a milder tone in speaking of the Jews and declares itself ready to give them some rights and effect their emancipation gradually, since they are not as yet fit for complete emancipation, in the opinion of these people.

A certain Orlov, whom the Moscow branch of the Real Russians sent to Poland to investigate conditions there, brought back a report that according to his view the Jews were more loyal to the government of Russia than the Poles.

The Educational League

By Dr. Daniel A. Huebsch

It has come to be accepted by the community that defectives of every nature are a charge upon them, so that hospitals, orphan asylums and relief societies are supported without question.

In the year 1896, it occurred to Mr. Martin A. Marks, of Cleveland, that the work concerning orphan children was not complete by merely housing, feeding and educating them up to the period of adolescence. And he was right: twenty years later, the average citizen is alive to the fact that it is a mistake to shove the average boy or girl—whether orphan or not—out into the world and expect them to make their way with no further aid than the physique and education given in the years of childhood.

He saw clearly that the orphan's lot was doubly hard, for the orphan's entry into the world had no parental wealth or influence to make it auspicious. His idea was to construct some means which should take the place of father, mother, counselor and friend.

With peculiar sympathy, Mr. Marks hit upon the happy idea that the future of the poor orphan child ought to be the care of the rich and well-favored child. And that idea he organized into what is now the Educational League, with a history of eighteen years of blessed activity written on its books.

The children of the rich form the League and they sustain it by payment of one dollar per year. Until the age of twenty-one each child pays his dues, but upon attaining his majority, he automatically becomes a life member.

These dues are used as a loan fund, and the record shows $18,000 have already been loaned to worthy orphans, helping them to go through higher educational and professional schools.

The time has come when this work is assuming larger proportions than the present income can take care of: in consequence, the time has come when the children of the rich must be urged to take up their responsibility to the orphaned children of the poor. A trifling sum is asked from each, but the aggregate performs a gigantic task.

When the Educational League idea came to the notice of the late Emanuel Lehman, of New York, he made inquiries concerning it and was so impressed by its possibilities that, upon his death, he willed the sum of $100,000 for the purpose, restricting his fund to the use of graduates from the New York Hebrew Orphan Asylum.

The originator of the idea is the President of the Educational League and he may well be proud of the idea and of the extent to which it has been a helpful element in the American life. Every parent ought to enroll his child's name as a partner in this enterprise, and make the child understand what it is doing for its unfortunate playmates. The lesson of responsibility for his brother is worth teaching at any price.

[Editorial Note.—At the last meeting of the Constitution Grand Lodge the work of the Educational League was approved and it was virtually made one of the institutions in which the B'nai B'rith would take an active interest. It was believed then that the lodges throughout the order would most heartily co-operate in instilling this beautiful thought into the minds of the children of their members as well as making use of the benefits of the League for gifted orphans who could be assisted to receive a higher education.

Let us hope that at the next convention the Committee on Educational League will suggest some method by which the plan, the purpose, and the benefits of the League shall be brought to the attention of every Jew in the land.]

A MIGHTY FORCE.

From the official Catholic Directory we compiled the following figures:

There are 16,300,000 Roman Catholics in the United States, showing a gain of 3,846,517 in the last ten years, and a gain of 7,231,445 during the past twenty years. According to the editor, at least 10 per cent should be added for "floating" Catholic population of which no record can be kept. There are 18,994 Catholic clergymen in the United States. There are 14,961 Catholic churches, showing that 310 new Catholic churches have been established during the past year. The statistics for New York State are as follows: Catholics, 2,885,824; churches with resident priests, 1,120; missions with churches, 311; secular clergy, 2,041; priests of religious orders, 687; seminaries, 8; seminarians, 1,051; parochial schools, 561; pupils, 235,569; colleges and academies for boys and girls, 134; students in colleges and academies, 17,710; homes, asylums and charitable institutions, 192.

FAITH—As a World Force

By RABBI TOBIAS SCHANFARBER Chicago, Illinois

Throughout the literature and history of the Jew the important lesson is taught of man's dependence upon God and the sovereignty of God's overruling Providence in the affairs of men. This universe is sane and rational and is governed by a sane and rational God. It is not the product of the fortuitous coming together of atoms. It is ruled by eternal and unchangeable laws. We are not the creatures of chance and circumstances, the sport and prey of unregulated and ungovernable forces and powers, but "there's a divinity that shapes our ends, rough hew them as we may." Judaism did not have to wait for the coming of any new philosophy or any new religion to learn aught of faith or optimism. Upon the opening pages of the bible the declaration is sent forth: "And God saw all that he had made and behold it was very good." This is the message with which the religion of the Jew is vocal—an enlightened and chastened faith in the divine though often mysterious and ununderstandable decrees of God.

Nowhere, in all the literatures of all the world can we find such inspiring and comforting sentiments, inculcating a lofty optimism, a serene faith, an almost mystic and saintly trust in the dispensations of God as are to be found in those divine outbursts of the inimitable writers of the Psalms. When the writer of the Twenty-Third Psalm, with a peaceful and satisfied composure illuminates his soul with the buoyant thought, "the Lord is my shepherd, I shall not want," when, with perfect submission and pious resignation he declares, "Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil for thou art with me, thy rod and thy staff they comfort me," he must have been thrilled through by the very presence of God and surcharged with the thought of his nearness to him; he must have confidently believed that God was at his side, guiding and guarding his footsteps, and as a result no danger or harm could befall him.

When the Psalmist in mystic but with reassured accents asks: "Whither shall I go from thy spirit or whither shall I flee from thy presence? If I should ascend into the heaven, thou art there, and if I should make my bed in the nether world thou art there, if I should lift up the wings of the morning dawn, if I should dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea, even there would thy hand lead me and thy right hand seize hold of me," when thus he hopefully speeks he betrays a soul aflame with the love of God, and peculiarly in touch with the Great Ruler of the Universe whose majestic presence had become his anchor of hope and his heavenly haven in the hour of trial and tribulation. For him the night had no terror, for even in the darkest hour God was visible and illuminating his path. For him sorrow and even death brought no dismay, for with the divine effulgence of God radiating out of and into his life even sorrow and death became transfigured and have their beneficent purposes. Such sovereign trust is of the very spirit of God Himself. It is what we, the children of this age, so sorely lack and because of which no ray of hope comes into our lives when the hand of Providence lays heavy upon us.

In what has been termed the most wonderful drama that has ever been given to the world, the drama of Job, which is said to have furnished Shakespeare with the inspiration for Hamlet, and Goethe the inspiration for Faust, we are again reinforced by a sterling example of true faith. His property destroyed by the elements, his children snatched away from him by the hand of death, he, himself afflicted with a loathsome disease and his wife urging him to curse God, Job breaks forth in a reply which will last as long as the world abides: "Even though he slay me, yet will I trust in him." Similarly our post biblical literature teems with sentiments rich with lessons of true faith and trust in God. When the rabbis with pious resignation declare Kol d'abid rakhmanah l'tab abid whatever God does he does for the best, they voiced an optimistic philosophy of life which called for the highest trust in the operations and unfoldings of the Universe. Rabbi Akiba's maxim has become a classic in Jewish literature gam zu l'tobah, "also this is for the good," indicating that what seems evil to our limited mind must in the ultimate analysis turn out to be good.

Indeed the whole history of the Jew is an exemplification of the Jew's faith in God. Were it not for this faith the Jew would not be living today. It is the consecrated force that amid all the persecutions and oppressions kept him in the arena of life battling for what he believed to be true and right. The explanation for the disappearance of so many other nations from the theater of life might be attributable to the fact that they were not possessed of faith in themselves or God in a sufficiently high degree or had no definite aim or purpose in life. At any rate the existence of the Jew can only be explained in the way that God needed and wanted him and that he was commissioned into the world for a definite and distinctive purpose, that of bringing to mankind his purer conception of God and man and their mutual relations one toward the other. Not until that mission has been fulfilled will he be prepared to lay down his burden.

When we read of the martyrdom of Hannah and her seven sons in the time of the Maccabees, because they refused to abandon their faith; when we read of the slow torture to death of the ten martyrs in the days of Hadrian, because they would not forsake their law; when we read of the many Jewish maidens and matrons heroically breathing out their last breath on the funeral pyre in the days of the Spanish inquisition, because they clung to the Shma with undying attachment; when today we read of the heartrending and revolting massacres in benighted countries; when the long line of martyrs of our faith come before our mind's eye and we note that under it all they never wavered or faltered; they never forsook their faith, they never once thought of giving up the righteous fight in behalf of God and man, we are painfully but forcefully reminded of the fact that no people and no religion have undergone so many hardships and indignities, that none has suffered so much for the faith that is in them as the Jews, and yet with all these facts before us an attempt is being made by certain new faith cults to show that the world had to wait for their coming to learn something about the high value of faith. Judaism needs to learn nothing of any of the new cults in the matter of a hopeful outlook upon the world. It did not have to wait for the appearance of any fantastic faith cult to learn of man's aboslute submission to God's will and decree. It is only those Jews who know nothing about their own Judaism, who are ignorant of its beautiful and inspiring Psalms, who are not familiar with their own literature or history, who will have the boldness and effrontery to declare that they can get something out of these new modern text-books not to be found in the literature of the Jew. The text-book on faith and life is the bible of the Jew, that wellspring of religious inspiration from which all other religious organizations have quenched their spiritual thirst. If the Jew were to give a little more time to the study of his own faith, he would get all the uplift he needed without trying to drink from the stolen waters of other creeds.

Nor are we unmindful of the fact that in certain quarters faith itself is under suspicion. Faith has been for so long a time associated with superstition, with myth and miracle, that many have come to feel that it has not the consecrating force which we ascribe to it. Foremost among these doubting Thomases are our own people. They are losing whatever faith their fathers once had. They believe that science has dethroned faith, but they have reckoned without their host. It is only the socialist or pseudo-scientist who will venture the ill-considered and ill-digested conclusion that faith is a negligible quantity in the domain of life and the discoverability of truth. For none knows better than the scientist himself that science has its faith basis the same as religion. It could arrive at no definite conclusions except for a supreme act of reasoned faith. The fundamental principle of science is its belief in the uniformity of the laws of nature, that is, if certain phenomenon result under certain conditions, the same results will obtain under similar conditions an absolute proof of this proposition is not within the range of possibility. It is based upon a sovereign act of faith. Of what is the essence of faith? It is trust in an unseen power or force within or without. We cannot explain this force. We cannot explain this power. But it is just as real and tangible and it is just as vital for the inspiration of man as any palpable force that makes for the development of man and humanity.

Wm. Thompson, knighted Lord Kelvin by Queen Victoria, because of his making the transatlantic cable a possibility by his discovery of the mirror galvanometer and syphon recorder is said to have had the faith of a little child. In many respects he was one of the most remarkable men of the age. When he died about seven years ago, at the age of 83, the reviewers of his life spoke about as much concerning his devoted attachment to religion as they did about his great scientific discoveries. To younger and more dogmatic scientists he was always pointing out the severe limitations of knowledge. Let the wise young men who prate about science and want to believe that religion is fast being outgrown listen to the words of Lord Kelvin: "Proofs of an intelligent and benevolent design lie all around." Thomas A. Edison, the wizard of Menlo Park, recently declared, "I am not a non-believer in God." He furthermore declared that "all scientists in getting nearer and nearer to a first cause feel that about and through everything there is the play of an eternal mind" when asked what part imagination plays in his work, he answered: "Science is mostly imagination." I ask the question, what is imagination? Imagination is sister to faith. Science is sister to faith. Without faith science would make very few discoveries. When Alexander Graham Bell, the discoverer of the telephone, was asked if he understood precisely how a telephone conveys the sound of a human voice, his answer was: "No; I only know what is done. I do not know how it is accomplished." Similarly Lord Kelvin once said he knew no more as to the nature of electricity than when he first began to work with it. A woman finds that tons and tons of a certain ore produce a fraction of a grain of radium—and we go to work with it and behold the portentous results that it achieves, but we do not know what it is. A number of sapient alienists at a trial give expert testimony—but no man among them knows what his own brain is, nor how it gives instantaneous directions to the foot and the hand. We are being told that the next great wonder of the world will be the ability to talk across the ocean by the wireless method—a wireless telephone—so that a man talking into the air in New York will convey his message to one listening in London, and we are told by Sir Godfrey Isaacs, a Jew, the co-worker of Marconi, that the time is not so far distant when it will crowd out the business of the ocean cable, which seemed like a miracle when Lord Kevlin first made it possible through his discoveries about fifty years ago. And where is the field in which the wireless operates? It is in the boundless ether and nobody knows what that ether is. The bible refers to it as a void. Certainly it is not material. It is supposed to be half way between that and the spiritual. It is not subject to gravity and it offers no resistance to bodies passing through it. We use this half spirit to carry our messages through the ocean. It also bears the light of a star trillions of miles with which to brighten human life.

So we see that science is helpless to explain many problems. It cannot explain the nature of nature. It cannot explain so simple a thing as the principle in the blade of grass or a drop of water, or an atom. But even though it cannot explain these things, it will not extinguish its imagination or check its faith in the hope of discovering new and yet unrevealed phenomenon. With imagination and faith as their companions new Livingstons and Scotts and Pearys and Amundsens will go out to discover new lands and new territories. With faith and imagination as their co-workers, new Edisons and Marconis and Kelvins will go out to wrest new secrets from the heavens, the earth and the waters under the earth. With imagination and faith as its ally the United States of America will go out to dig new Panama canals and bring the nations of the world closer and closer together. With imagination and faith as their friends, the moralist and sociologist will go out in their search for the brighter and better day yet to be, despite the discomforting conditions of humanity that now surround us!

Faith is the electric torch in the hand of the scientist; it is the magic wand wielded by the philosopher in search of the philosopher's stone; it is the talisman touching into life with its witchery and wizardry what seems dull, dead and lifeless. Faith is the budding staff in the hand of every son of humanity, turning the bitter waters into sweet and extracting hope out of what seems dark and hopeless. Faith is a tonic to those prostrated on the sick couch and even in death it furnishes the key that unlocks the door to life everlasting.

Have faith in yourself and half the battle is won. Have faith in humanity and you will see humanity become humane, though the process be slow. Have faith in God and the burdens of life become bearable. Have faith in Israel and Israel will continue to live. Be without faith in yourself and what is easy of accomplishment becomes difficult. You can never hope to realize the divine possibilities implanted within you by God. Be without faith in humanity and slower will be the growth of humanity toward those ideal heights prophesied for it by all the seers of all times and all ages. Be without faith in God and the earth becomes a playground of hostile forces where the powers of darkness have universal sway and where blind chance is the governing force and hope becomes an unknown quantity and despair rules with undisputed authority. Be without faith in Israel and the deathlessness of Israel will no longer be an assured fact. O, thou of little faith, leave the lowlands of doubt and despair and rise to the mountain peaks of true faith, there to be transfigured by the illuminating rays of God's beneficent light and life and hope.

A Call—An Opportunity

By Mr. Samuel Fleischman, New York, N. Y.

There are upwards of 12,000,000 Jews scattered among the various nations of the world. Owing to their religious belief and observances, they form a distinct group in every country. They are bound together in sentiment by racial and religious ties, but are not united in any international organization. Therefore, when a Jewish question becomes acute in any country, though its solution may seriously affect, directly or indirectly, Jewry at large, there is no concerted action by or on behalf of all Jews. The defense of common Jewish interests is left to such individuals and organizations as may see fit to intervene. Frequently, in consequence of delay in action, unpreparedness and lack of effective co-operation, either nothing of value is achieved or the result of the intervention is wholly inadequate. It does not follow that all Jews of all nations should be gathered into one organization, authorized to represent and speak for them, or that all the Jews of any nation should so combine and be represented—such a course would, in my opinion, be unwise, and I believe that all attempts to effect such a combination should be strenuously opposed. But the conditions referred to, the ever present Jewish problem, at all times insistent for solution, sometimes most urgently in one country and at other times in another, demand the existence of a great organized body, fully equipped and at all times prepared to effectively handle any Jewish question, in whatever part of the globe it may arise. SUCH AN ORGANIZATION HAS BECOME THE INDEPENDENT ORDER B'NAI B'RITH. Started in New York City seventy-five years ago, its growth has been continuous. Its beneficent influence upon American Jewry has been tremendous. It has championed the Jewish cause whenever and wherever in any part of the world the Jewish people have been persecuted or the Jewish name assailed, and in every calamity it has brought substantial aid to our distressed co-religionists. It is international in scope—splendidly organized with Grand Lodges and local Lodges in Europe, Asia and Egypt, all active and comprising among their membership the flower of Jewish manhood in their respective communities.

Here we have a powerful, virile organization, with widespread international affiliations ready, when the great conflict now raging in Europe draws to a close, to strive for justice for our down-trodden brethren in Russia. It should have behind it the active co-operation of all American Jews. The unanimous sentiment of the people of the United States and of all advanced countries in Europe will support it in its demand for common justice to the Jew. If we act together, wholeheartedly, with faith in our cause, we cannot fail.

What Jew in America, be he leader or private, will refuse to enlist in such a cause?

LODGES OF THE B'NAI B'RITH, HEED THE CALL OF THE HOUR. STRENGTHEN YOURSELVES BY INCREASED MEMBERSHIP SO THAT YOU MAY BE PREPARED TO RENDER EFFICIENT AID IN THE STRUGGLE FOR UNIVERSAL FREEDOM FOR THE JEW.

Our Order will speak and act.
District No. 1 will do its duty.

DEMAND THE RESIGNATION OF JEWISH MEMBER OF PARLIAMENT.

The Conservative Club of Paddington has repeated its demand that Arthur Strauss, the Jewish member of parliament for that district, shall resign forthwith on account of his being a naturalized citizen and native of Germany.

After the previous demand of the Paddington Conservatives, the leaders of the Conservative party officially censured the Paddington association on their attitude, which they declared was stupid.

The Paddington Conservatives, however, ignored their leaders' reproval, and have now unanimously adopted a resolution calling upon Mr. Strauss to tender his resignation as their representative in the English parliament.

An Inspired Laity

By MARTIN A. MEYER
Rabbi, Temple Emanu-El
San Francisco, Cal.

With reference to the distinction between rabbis and Israelites in ordinary, the use of the terms ecclesiastic and layman is decidedly recent. In ancient Israel such a distinction existed between the priests and the Levites on the one hand and the Israelites, laymen, on the other. The destruction of the Temple, the cessation of the sacrificial cult, the dispersion of the people of Israel, and in particular the restatement of Judaism in terms other than that of the Temple cult, in terms of the Torah with its closely allied disciplines of Study and Prayer, broke down this distinction. From that time the priest continued their tradition of Aaronitic descent, functioning only as such on three occasions in the Jewish life; at the pronouncing of the Priestly benediction; on the occasion of the redemption of the first born; and being privileged to be "called up" first for the public reading from the Pentateuchal Scroll. The Wise Man took the place of the priest as the religious functionary in Israel of the Diaspora; the rabbi in his school house and synagog succeeded the priest at the altar in the spiritual unfolding of the people. But rabbis did not form a caste, nor did they regard themselves as endowed with any particular powers, save that of learning. Any adult Israelite of good character was allowed to read the prayers as the representative of the congregation. The rabbi did not earn his living as a religious teacher. He followed a business to support himself and his family, giving of himself without recompense to the service of God and Israel. It was an ideal arrangement for an age in which life was lived on simple terms. The Jewish communities were small, and the needs of the individual modest. The general tendency of life towards differentation of effort and specialization did not leave Jewish life unaffected. The decrease in Jewish learning, the sine qua non of the rabbinate, further aided in the movement which eventually set the rabbi aside and apart as a clerical and reduced his community of peers to a congregation of laymen. So in the evolution of Jewish life we have gone back to a condition of affairs which resembles that of an earlier age, though be it understood that the modern rabbi in no sense feels himself an ecclesiastic with special gifts or privileges as did the priests of old. His profession is the result of social and economic forces in modern life. The layman is once more an element to be recognized in the constitution of Jewry.

By reason of his learning, the rabbi of former generations enjoyed the leadership in Israel. Jews respected learning as such, particularly Jewish learning. Rabbinic leadership was unquestioned. There were both leaders and army. Today we hear complaints on both sides that there are neither leaders nor army. The layman is wandering about like a lost sheep without a shepherd, while the leaders cry out that they dream dreams and see visions, but that there is no responsive voice. The breach widens between the two and each becomes more conscious of his own interests and possibilities. Where there is any degree of earnestness of interest in things Jewish there exists a regretable antagonism, mutual distrust and misunderstanding between these two elements of Jewish life. In the meantime the cause is suffering harm. The pulpit indulges in sarcasm at the expense of the pew and the layman retaliates by absence from the synagog and overt and covert attacks upon the rabbinate. If any good could come from such a breach it might justify itself. As it is, it is pitiable in its betrayal of a great cause which needs the devoted service of all its followers. The exigencies of modern life have made it difficult to hope for a return to an earlier stage in which the rabbi was merely "primus inter pares," a leader in scholarship and in action in a community of scholars. Pulpit and pew have become necessary factors in this modernized age. But it is possible to heal the breach and help the cause. For in our tragedy the CAUSE is the thing.

The first requirement is that of an educated laity. Much ill-considered criticism and consequent heartache has arisen because the rabbi and the laity speak as it were different languages; they do not understand each other in this confusion of tongues and all the noble aspirations to build a temple which would pierce the heavens and touch the throne of God are lost because of this misunderstanding. After all, the need is that of a particular kind of education, JEWISH EDUCATION. Thank God there is an increasing number of educated men and women in our ranks, who are in touch with all aspects of life and literature, science and art, all with one notable exception. There is no dearth of educated men and women, but there is a tragic absence of Jews educated in things Jewish. Many a ritual committee of our modern synagog, for example, has committed egregious blunders because of its ignorance of the content and the spirit of the traditional Jewish liturgy. It had no directing and controlling force save frequently that of reduction of the length of time of the service and the subordination of everything to the sermon, lecture or address. Ignorance of Jewish history in detail and in general has not helped the layman understand the aims and tendencies of Jewish life and evolution. There must needs be a common speech for layman and rabbi. The newcomers to Palestine found it expedient to sink their linguistic differences in a knowledge of the ancient tongue, and out of expediency has developed one of the most promising movements in modern Jewish life. So, too, in the common tongue of Jewish knowledge will there be the promise of a new and vigorous life for the Jew wherever he may be. The minimum knowledge of the average Jew of the Hebrew language has not made him a competent judge of its ritual value or of its historic importance for the expression of the Jewish soul and mind. Without doubt, an adequate knowledge of Hebrew would help many a Jew find himself and feel himself more in touch and sympathy with the stream of Jewish life.

The reduction of the Hebrew to a mere incident of the ritual has correspondingly weakened its hold upon the Jewish consciousness. An age which looks upon it as incidental will soon find itself regarding it as unnecessary and hampering. An appreciation of Jewish achievement and Jewish ideals will reinspire many a dying soul and offer satisfaction to many a weary and thirsty heart. If the rabbi be true to the ideal of Jewish scholarship and the laity make the necessary effort to join with him in his enthusiasms for these Jewish values, it cannot be gainsaid that the consciousness of difference will be decreased and eventually eliminated. Of course there is in some quarters a childish delight in the thought that the rabbi is a scholarly man. For the most part the judgment of scholarliness has no other basis than the ignorance of them who make such judgment. It would be a healthy thing for the rabbi, too, if he had an educated laity who would hold him up to better standards of scholarship than what he has derived from the reading of the popularized digests of the Encyclopedia. An educated laity would consequently be a healthy control on the rabbi—there be many who remember the frequent correction of the Reader in his rendition of the weekly section from the Torah—and such knowledge and understanding of the full content of Judaism would enable the rabbi to be the better appreciated and his work more correctly understood.

But even more than the need of an educated laity, is the call for an inspired laity. After all to preach week after week and to work year in and year out with a group of men and women who sit back comfortably in their pews and who bring no enthusiasm for things Jewish with them into the synagog is about the most deadening and soul-destroying experience that can fall to the lot of any man. Why do so many of our young rabbis—and for that so many of our young laymen—who start out to serve the cause with an overflowing enthusiasm wilt so quickly, and either fall into the class of bromidic platitudinists or even withdraw from the work altogether? A dead pew makes for a dead pulpit; and rare indeed is the genius that can overcome the handicap of the consciousness of the indifference of the great bulk of the laity. It must not be the inspiration of selfishness. Too often have soi disant leaders used the cause as "a spade to dig with." Many a one has built his own tomb because he has served himself rather than the Jew and Judaism. Nor has the vague sense of serving any old cause, whatever happens to come along, been any more salvational. In the flowery platitudes of generalities, many a good cause and many a high hope has been irretrievably lost. Even the constantly shrinking world of modern life and thought is far too big a thing to be served in the mass. There must needs be a sense of devotion to and loyalty for some definite cause. Many a man has started out animated by philanthropic ideals only to learn that philanthropy expresses itself in very definite forms and to one of these definite forms he must bend his best effort and lend his best service if aught is to be accomplished. So, too, must we find our inspiration in the cause of the Jew. It is, after all is said and done, our cause, and no one's else. If we do not serve it, none will serve it and it will inevitably be lost in the ocean of undifferentiated things. The sense that it is a cause, whether we be nationalists or religionists, matters little at this point, that it is a cause worthy of service and sacrifice offers inspiration and consecration, too. Such an inspired laity will force its leaders to the heights. It will not be content to be grovelling forever in the deep shadows of the valley. It will demand the rarified and stimulating atmosphere of the high places and will be ready and eager to struggle with the great difficuties incident to achievement and realization. And the happy leader who finds such a group about him will feel himself urged on to the very gates of heaven itself. After all the oft repeated criticism that the synagog service leaves this or that worshipper cold is as much a criticism of the worshipper as it is of the rabbi or the leader. They bring nothing save their physical selves; consequently they take nothing. The ignorant visitor to the art gallery will be impressibly bored by the very things which will enlarge the heart of the informed and enthusiastic spectator. The Jewish cause cannot be expected to inspire non-Jewish or un-Jewish hearts. The enthusiast will find new inspiration at every point. He will add to his store from every source. And I might add at this point that the lack of this sense of consecration and the impulse of inspiration is not apparent to the rabbi alone, but well nigh to every one who has given himself over to the problems of leadership and service. Our charity workers and our lodge organizers and our synagog trustees all encounter this chill attitude of heart and soul and mind. An inspired Jewish laity will find its leaders, for it will create them out of its own body. There can be no room for doubt as to what would have been the fate of the Maccabees had they not been able to count upon an enthusiastic and inspired following. When the dread day did come, that the sense of a cause was no longer in the hearts of the Jews of those days, even a Judas Maccabee was unable to rouse his people and to gather a sufficient following! and defeat and death were his tragic end.

"Come, let us reason together." Come let us understand that the world of life is a circle and that inspired leaders need inspired followers to continue to inspire these followers to greater effort and for big results. Mutually understanding each other, reciprocally inspiring each other, rabbi and layman, leader and army, can accomplish what the materially minded world calls the impossible. The Cause will be saved for the people and the people for the Cause. We shall serve ourselves to good advantage and so serving ourselves we shall add to the higher values of the world. Perfection lies in attention to the minutest details of things, thereby assuring completion. World safety lies in the perfection of each of its constituent parts. That way lies the hope of the Jew, through self realization in self reverence, self knowledge and self respect, the way of sovereign power.

The Jew in the Small Community

I. E. Marcuson, Pres. D. G. L. No. 5.

To one facing the question which confronts the writer undertaking anew the Presidency of District No. 5, the Jew in the small community is of first moment. It has often been asked why this district lags behind, and does not show the growth and increase which marks the advancement of other districts. It is, of course, a question of history why the Southeast has not been thickly populated by the Jews. As a matter of fact, he has been shown every consideration. The prejudice which has manifested itself in the New England States is practically unknown, and if it has appeared at all, it has been in very recent years, and in isolated cases.

In the early years the Jews settled very thickly along the South Atlantic Coast, but after the deyelopment of the Gulf States and the Middle West, they left in great numbers, and few have remained on the former chosen spots of the Southern States. But in considering the question today, we must face conditions as we find them. The number of Jews in any one community is small. The result is, surrounded as they naturally are by an overwhelming number of non-Jewish neighbors, they seem to feel that their safety and future lies in the fact of hiding or subordinating their religion. It is true that among the most ardent and sincere workers for the public good, that among the leaders in every movement for civic advancement, that among the benefactors in every line of philanthropy, the Jew stands out of all proportion to his number, and this is as it should be made secondary to the public when our Jews do realize that the day has come when they should subordinate individuality to public good, that there are times in life when even business should be made secondary to the public welfare. The tragedy of it all is that they are repeating the old story of Moses, who, eager enough to defend his brethren in private, is "slow of speech and heavy of tongue" when sent to publicly defend them or to fight their cause. "Send another, O Lord, in my place." This may have been originally a matter of self preservation; or at least the Jew of the smaller community thought it was. He failed to realize, that one living right and standing true to his colors could quickly change the public opinion, as to what the Jew stands for in the community. I fear that it was this craven attitude of the Jew in the small community, that gave prejudice an opportunity to increase because of misunderstanding of the Jew. Let us hope that this is all in the past. Today we stand like Kipling's "Tomlinson," and the question is put to us, "What have ye done?" It is no longer sufficient to tell in glowing terms the glory of Israel's past; it is no longer sufficient to enumerate the names of those who, in the past generation have brought glory to Israel's name. Ye have read, ye have heard, ye have thought and the tale is yet to run: by the worth of the body that once you had, give answer, what have ye done?" The sacrifices of the past of Israel have made for her a place glorious in history, but the words of the poet ring true today, "There's little room between the stars, in idleness to prate, oh, none may reach by hired speech of neighbor, priest and kin, through borrowed deed to God's good meed that lies so fair within." No matter how great its past, before the Bnai Brith there lies a mission more important than that which shaped its glorious career in the generation just past. Like Aaron of old, it must go forth to meet the brother who is unwilling or unable to assume the responsibility and burden which history has laid upon him. It must lead these brothers, who can or will not deliver God's message to the world into the presence of Pharaoh and must plead for them until they themselves become conscious of their power. and in a little while, their might and strength will come to them, and like Moses of old, they will take the rod of God into their hands and with the power they never dreamed they had, work miracles which will confound the astrologers of Egypt. If we can do this in district No. 5, I believe the future of the Bnai Brith, as well as that of the Jew, is assured in the Southeast. The larger cities are doing their best. If we can only make them realize their responsibility to the smaller community, and then awaken the smaller community to their responsibility to the House of Israel, and to the crying need for keeping in touch with the purifying source of the living waters of their religion, there will be hope for the future. We all know that the pool which does not receive fresh water soon becomes stagnant, and not only is it spoiled itself, but it becomes a source of danger and infection to the neighborhood. So the Jew, cut off entirely, not only from religious service, but from all contact with things Jewish, loses the influences which he could exert, and becomes rather a danger to the house of Israel. It is this problem that district No. 5 is undertaking to solve. The leaders of the district realize that it is a difficult and serious question. This religious "sleeping sickness" which has attacked our country co-religionists needs expert treatment, so that we can ascertain whether the infection has become so deep rooted that a cure is no longer possible We trust and hope that the Jew will awaken to his duty and to his responsibility, not only to Israel but to the world.

RUSSIA AND THE GALICIAN JEWS.

The report of the Russian Commission, headed by one of the officials of the Ministry of the Interior, M. M. Purishkevitch, on Galicia has been made public. Dealing with the demands of the anti-Semites for the confiscation of the land owned by Jews on the ground that they were hostile to the Russian occupation, the Commission boldly rejected the plan. The Commissioners, as a result of their close investigations, declared that the present attitude of the Jews towards the Russian conquerors could only be characterized as one of fear and uncertainty as to who their future rulers would be. However, the Commission anticipated that the Jews would be the first to assist in the union of the new provinces with Russia on the establishment of a firm regime in the country. The plan to confiscate the land owned by Jews, or even the discussion of such a suggestion could, in the opinion of the Commission, only destroy the chances of co-operation of Jews in the union of Galicia with Russia.

The Double Standard in Public and Private Life

By

Dr. SAMUEL SALE

I think it may be truly said of our age that we live by a double standard of morality in public and private life. We are yet in that state of moral imperfection, in which we see the mote in our brother's eye, but fail to remove the beam which obstructs our own vision. We recognize the need and excellence of honesty and fair-dealing in our private relations, and in a healthy state of society, we esteem and judge men by their adherence to these principles, but in the large life, in politics, in municipal, State, national and international affairs, trickery and cunning, injustice and inhumanity seem to carry it away in open day. Diplomacy, which is only another name for duplicity, is still the accredited art by which nations deal with each other in the settlement of their difficulties, and what we call international law, or the rights of nations, is a very uncertain and elastic term, whose meaning is determined by considerations of an intensely selfish and material nature, backed by their inevitable complement of brute force and injustice. The most eminent statesman of modern times gave unblushing countenance to the doctrine that there is no room for moral agencies in politics, and when the interests of the State are at stake, when the imaginary honor and aggrandizement of the nation demand it, foul means become fair. The past policy of all European governments has sanctioned the maxim that the end justifies the means, and since in the eyes of their greatest statesmen, there is no higher end than the material advancement of the State and nation, the plainest principles of justice and equity may be rudely brushed aside.

The prophets of ancient Israel, who were the world's greatest moral teachers, held that God and justice should rule in the State, just as they were to be regulative of the life of individuals. Their view was that justice was the cardinal virtue of man, and that both the State and society, being but larger agencies for its realization, must become its embodiment; if they did not become the instrument for its wider dissemination, they were, according to their conviction, not only unworthy of continuance, but would inevitably be doomed to destruction; "behold the eyes of the eternal God are upon the sinful kingdom and I will destroy it from off the face of the earth." In strict keeping with this belief, we are told in the book of Kings that extermination was denounced against the dynasty of the house of Omri on account of one act of injustice and inhumanity perpetrated against a simple peasant, a plain man of the people.

Ahab and his successors might have continued the idolatrous cult of Baal; it was not for that that their doom was pronounced, but for the outrage upon justice and humanity admitted in the murder of Naboth. In this connection, too, it were well to remind all those, even of the most liberal school, who are never sure of their own faith, unless they tax the religion of Israel with narrowness,—that these sturdy men of God played no favorites, and as this example of Elijah proves they were as quick to hurl their denunciations against the rulers of Israel and Judah, as against those of foreign nations. Nay, Israel was to be held to even a stricter account for its transgressions than other peoples, just because it had been called to a greater responsibility, and a more important service in the cause of humanity (Amos 3, 2). But this olden political ideal of our prophets, which lived in the founders of our Republic and found a classic expression in the declaration of independence and the constitution of the United States, seems now abandoned to dreamers. In these halcyon days of superior culture and civilization, when the idol-worship of material and national growth possesses the soul of men, a nation's plighted faith may be broken with impunity, and the right of self government for which this nation was builded, may be heedlessly trampled under foot. If old Isaiah came among us again, he might cry aloud as of yore: "If ye make many prayers, I will not hear, for your hands are full of blood." According to this ideal view, religion and bloodshed are at opposite poles, the one is the absolute negation of the other, and if we measure our age by this olden Jewish standard, what consummate hypocrites we must be! It seems that we only wear the mask of religion, the better to beguile, and in the very doing of the ugly deed, we expect and court the applause of an admiring world. We have yet to learn the significance of the ancient injunction: "Thou shalt not have a twofold measure in thy house." We cannot be sinners in public and saints in private life. This pernicious doctrine of practical politics and of sham religion, that there is one law of morality for individuals and another for nations, is eating away the core of our civilization and undermining the peace and prosperity of mankind. This ruinous principle, in the guise of imperialism, has knocked at the gates of our own country, but we have not lost hope that the better conscience of the nation may yet be awakened. It is yet time for America to return to its true self, and demonstrate to the raving world, that "righteousness exalteth a nation and wrong doing is a disgrace to the peoples." A vicious foreign policy is perhaps only the natural result of political profligacy to which we have become accustomed at home. Mr. Lecky has written, a book in which he undertakes to show that liberty and democracy are incompatible, or that popular government such as ours is a failure. His strongest arguments in proof of his thesis, are taken from the state of affairs in our own country, and Andrew D. White, who was a most competent critic and thoroughly acquainted with conditions abroad, after making a very unfavorable comparison between New York and Berlin, gives it as his deliberate opinion, that, while as a rule, in other civilized countries, municipal governments have been made generally honest and serviceable, our own, as a rule, are the worst in the world, and are steadily growing worse. Mr. Bryce, who is a fair-minded and sympathetic student of our government and its institutions, supports the view of Mr. White and says, that the government of cities is the one conspicuous failure of the U. S. He considers the faults of the State governments insignificant, as compared with the waste, corruption and mismanagement which mark the administration of our municipal affairs. These views may not hold today as unconditionally as when they were first uttered, but there is still enough truth in them, to make us blush in their telling. We are told that these are the inevitable consequences of a popular form of government such as ours.

Is it true that men are not worthy nor capable of a full measure of political freedom, for which the founders of this Republic believed the American people ripe, and for which we have believed a kind Providence, the genius that shapes the destiny of mankind, has builded this nation? We are not willing to admit that the pestilential conditions from which we are suffering, are either inherent in our form of government or inseparably bound up with incorrigible human nature. The abuses, I take it, are due to the fact that we have as yet developed no corporate conscience, and that we are woefully lacking in the sense of duty toward the commonwealth. We have not yet learned the first and most important lesson of citizenship in a Republic, that the obligations, which the community in which and through which we live, places upon us are paramount. We either postpone the affairs of the larger body to our own, or we neglect them altogether. We still acquiesce to some extent in the ruinous notion expressed by a prominent business man at the time of the Tweed regime; "we have thought this thing over, said he, and we find, it pays better to neglect our city affairs than to attend to them; we can make more money in the time required for the full discharge of our political duties, than the politicians can steal from us, on account of our not discharging them." This is the view that the making of money is the supreme object of life, and that the sole purpose of government is to facilitate that process. It is just this view which has brought us into deserved disrepute. Aside from the fact that those who hold such views are abettors of crime and compounders of felony, the companions of thieves, as Isaiah would have called them,—the assumption is false even from a practical point of view. Every neglect of public duty, every malversation in office must sooner or later come home to every individual in the community. The poison-germs of public immorality are as sure to find their way into our homes and to contaminate the various associations of life, as the microbes of an infectious disease, stalking through our city, will attack all classes of the community, rich and poor alike. The very fact that we live by a double standard, that we condemn in private what we condone in public life, makes the evil all the more insidious. The broad distinction which we make between political and other misdeeds is most pernicious. A public official should certainly be regarded in the same light as we do a trustee or a director of a bank. Why should the latter, in case of a betrayal of his trust, he made to feel the rigor of the law, while the former generally go free? It may be on the theory that the interests entrusted to a public official are larger than those of a bank-director, and he may therefore abuse or betray them with impunity, on the ground that little thieves are caught, and the big ones may roam at large. In our city just a few months ago, a judge created no little sensation by exhonerating a person who was charged with a petty offense, and assigning as his reason, that he wanted to reverse the usual practice of sending the little thieves to jail and the big ones to Congress. A community which is indulgent toward one form of dishonesty will soon learn to tolerate another, and those very conditions of society which go to make dishonest politicians, will in good time produce like results in other walks of life. We might almost imagine that old Isaiah was confronted by a political situation very much like ours and that he was describing some of our own worthies, when he says of the authorities of his day: every one loveth bribe and runneth after gratuities, and while he taxes all the people as a brood of evil-doers, he is especially severe against the leaders, because he knew that it was through them that the people were led astray. The maintenance of a high standard of honor in public life is undoubtedly one of our most vital needs. The momentous question, however, which is basic to our whole civilization, is the elemental one: shall there be one law of right and justice, one principle of morality to guide the conduct of individuals, to rule in the councils of the State, and to govern the intercourse of nations, and shall the policies and aims of the empires of the world be made to comport with this single standard, this universal law of ethics? Down through the ages, comes the message of our ancient faith: "though clouds and darkness be all around Him, yet righteousness and justice are the base of His throne." The nation that will not heed this gospel of Israel, this verdict of universal history, cannot survive, for with our own Lowell, we hold: truth forever on the scaffold, wrong forever on the throne,

Yet that scaffold sways the future, and behind the dim unknown
Standeth God within the shadow, keeping watch above His own."

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE COMMITTEE ON PUBLICATION REPLIES TO "JEWS AND CHRISTIAN SCIENCE."

Editor B'nai B'rith News, Chicago.

Now that the discussion of Christian Science by Dr. Deinard under the caption, "Jews and Christian Science," which began in the January issue, has been brought to a close, I should appreciate an opportunity to point out some of the misapprehensions regarding the religion under consideration which are created by the article. It is not my purpose to enter into the question at issue.

I have no hesitation in denying the charge that the members of the Jewish faith who have joined the Christian Science Church have been induced to do so by misrepresentation and falsification. While no religion can control or speak for the acts of all its adherents, such methods are opposed to both the teaching and practice of Christian Science. Dishonesty is bad Christian Science, and were it practiced, as is intimated, it would have exactly the opposite result from that attributed to it, and instead of attracting people to Christian Science, would have wrecked the movement. Nor are persons hurried into membership in the Christian Science Church. On the contrary, members are not accepted until they have passed an examination which shows them to have an adequate understanding and a reason "for the hope that is in them." It may be safely assumed that those who have adopted Christian Science have done so for what they find it to be, not on the basis of false representation.

It would be readily conceded by any Christian Scientist that if this religion were in fact what Dr. Deinard conceives it to be, it would have amounted to little and certainly would not have merited the extended consideration it has had in your publication. It is a matter of regret that in discussing a religion of such notable practical achievements he should have permitted himself to ridicule some of its fundamental postulates which he admits he does not comprehend, such for instance, as the Christian Science definition of God. The understanding of God and man's relation to God, derived by Mrs. Eddy from the Scriptures, is the very essence of Christian Science, and although there are those who, like our critic, have failed to find this definition intelligible, this does not warrant him in ridiculing it, since there are thousands of others who have succeeded in comprehending it and in such a practical way that their understanding has sufficed to heal them and others of sin, sorrow, misfortune and disease in its most malignant form.

There are those also who deny that God is, in fact, omnipotent and that He made all that was made, and who deny that man is made in His likeness. Nevertheless, to subscribe to these statements of Scripture and to accept them as the fundamental facts of existence does not require any irrational process. In fact a very strong presumption of rationality is created when, on the basis of this conception, the sick are healed.

With regard to this healing work the article in question conveys a wholly wrong impression, due no doubt to incorrect information. That Christian Science in less than fifty years has taken its place as one of the world's great healing agencies is a matter of fact, not opinion. Our critic states in effect that the healing to its credit is confined to nervous disorders, but this is so far from the fact that I believe it may be stated that there is not one of the list of so-called incurable diseases whose cure has not been accomplished through Christian Science. Among these are tuberculosis, tumor, cancer, and similar afflictions which can by no stretch of the imagination be classed as nervous disorders. Carefully authenticated cases of the successful healing through Christian Science of the above named diseases and many others, including heart disease, drink and drug habits, and rheumatism, may be found on pages 1107 and following pages of the Congressional Record of January, 1915, and testimonies covering disorders of various natures appear regularly in the Christian Science Journal and the Christian Science Sentinel.

Nor is there ground for the contention that Christian Science healing is the result of hypnotism or suggestion. In view of the unparalleled achievements of Christian Science, such a theory would necessarily mean that Christian Science practitioners were the foremost exponents of the practice of suggestion, a "reductio ad absurdum" resulting in making those who do not believe in, study or understand hypnotism and suggestion more skilled in their application than those who do. The fact it that they are the antipodes of Christian Science. The premise upon which suggestion is based, namely, that one human mind acts upon another, is denied by the fundamental theorem of Christian Science, that God, Principle, is the only Mind, and that true mental action proceeds only from God to man, not from man to man.

The healing of Christian Science is due in fact solely to the power of God, "who healeth all thy diseases" (Psalms)—to the understanding, in its relation to human affairs, of the truth of that statement in Genesis 1:2: "God created man in His own image, in the image of God created He him." The healing which results from this understanding is accepted by Christian Scientists as the proof of its correctness.

Every denomination is faced by the necessity of reconciling certain apparently divergent statements in the Scriptures. Our critic is mistaken in thinking that Christian Science "forgets" that there is both a spiritual and a material account of creation in the Bible. On the contrary, an extended treatment of these two accounts will be found in the Christian Science text-book, "Science and Health with Key to the Scriptures," by Mary Baker Eddy, in the chapter on Genesis, resulting in the acceptance of the spiritual as the true account, the other being understood as the false sense of creation presented in contradistinction to the true.

The Jew as well as the Christian Scientist has both accounts to deal with. If he queries what has been done with the material account, we may ask what disposition has been made of the spiritual account. Again, when asking what, in Christian Science, becomes of the material world, it becomes necessary to decide, if the Christian Science teaching be denied, what becomes of the omnipotence of God with omnipotent and indestructible matter accepted as a reality. In this connection our critic points to certain of the miracles of the Bible in which some material act was performed, and chooses to regard this material act as the essence of the miracle. There are, however, many other miracles in the Old as well as the New Testament which involve no material act and which therefore, on a material basis, become impossible of explanation. In Christian Science what are commonly called miracles are regarded as natural rather than miraculous manifestations of divine power, the result of belief in and understanding of God's omnipotence. The same results would, according to Christian Science, be seen today, under the same exalted thought, and let me point out that Jesus' acts of walking on the water and stilling the tempest are deemed attainable by any one who could reach His state of consciousness.

Whether the members of the Jewish faith can consistently accept Christian Science is not for me to say, but if they are to give the question any intelligent consideration, it must be from the standpoint of what Christian Science really is, what it actually teaches and accomplishes and this can best be gained by a study of its text-book and Bible.

Very truly yours,

AVERY COONLEY.

Ehrlich's Monumental Work

By Dr. MAX L. MARGOLIS

Let the reader at once be informed that the Ehrlich I am dealing with here is not the famous German physician. The discoverer of "606" is like the subject of this sketch, a Jew; his Christian colleagues know the fact too well, or else they would have long ago proposed him for a University professorship. What was denied him by fellow-students was made good in a way by the Emperor who created for him an institution for medical research and placed the noted investigator at the head of it. Our own Ehrlich—for we must own him as Americans and Jews—is like most Jews, muchly hyphenated; his birthplace was Russian Poland, his secondary education he obtained in Germany, but his ripe manhood he has spent with us. New Yorkers of the business world may and may not have heard of him; but wheresoever the Hebrew Scriptures are a matter of interest, the name and person of Ehrlich the Bible commentator will be found to be known. Nor is Ehrlich unknown to a number of young men now in American pulpits whom Ehrlich the teacher initiated into the mysteries of the Hebrew language.

The most renowned Bible commentators of bygone days were teachers, and teachers of younger students at that. When the famous Babylonian schools flourished, there were a few presidents—Gaons they were called—who had time and interest for the Bible study; the majority occupied themselves with the weightier matters of law that the students might know how to direct the people in their religious practices. Whatever of Bible work there was done in those days fell to the lot of the obscure teachers in the elementary grades. It is they who watched over the sacred text and established its correct readings; it is they who lovingly counted every letter; it is to them that we owe the beginnings of grammatical study. And so it was in after times. The Spanish grammarians and commentators complain that scant attention is paid by the Talmudists to correct reading or grammar. David Kimhi was in his day an obscure school teacher in the Provence; and yet all that is best in our current text-books goes back to him. His influence may be seen in every line of the English Bible of 1611. And to our own very days the rabbi, be he of the old type or the modern, is little of a Bible student or Hebraist. The notable exceptions prove the rule. Of the three Jewish Bible commentators of the last century only one was a rabbi. I mean Malbim. Luzzatto was the head of the rabbinical college at Padua, but he was no rabbi. And Ehrlich who is still with us taught in the New York Jewish Orphan Asylum the rudiments of Hebrew lore.

If Malbim and Luzzatto were hooted in Judaism which they loved with all their being, the one uncompromisingly orthodox, the other conservative in all that is essential and an implacable foe of modernism, Ehrlich, it must be owned, is somewhat of a detached Jew. No party will claim him as its own nor will he claim any party his own. An objective attitude in matters scientific is ordinarily a merit. One should think that the Bible meaning ought to be the same to all students. Christians and Jews, believers and infidels, ought to be of one mind as regards the interpretation of books composed in days of yore. So it ought to be perhaps, but in reality it is not so. Objectivity in matters affecting the holiest interests of mankind is possible within the narrowest limits only. As matters stand, there is a friendly and unfriendly attitude towards the Bible, and objectivity partakes of unfriendliness. Ehrlich goes out of his way to speak an unkindly word about Jews and Judaism. The sallies are the more shocking as they are quite unnecessary to the purpose. We Bible students have to put up with a good deal of this kind in the commentaries of Christian scholars. But when the thrust comes from one who is of our own blood, the attack is still more galling.

Ehrlich has deposited his comments on the Hebrew Scriptures first in Hebrew and now in German. For Ehrlich is a remarkable linguist He writes in English and in German and in Hebrew with equal fluency. Let the reader understand that neither the Hebrew work in three volumes nor the German in seven is a commentary of the kind we are ordinarily accustomed [illegible] commentator feels obliged to [illegible] on every aspect of an ancient [illegible] or writing. The bulk is naturally not new; many observations are carried from commentary to commentary. But the student gets a total acquaintance with the subject. Ehrlich has chosen to write only notes on selected points. In these he is original or at least he means to be original. How far Ehrlich has been anticipated by others remains to be seen. How much he has consciously or unconsciously taken over from Malbim and Luzzatta and others is a matter that will bear investigation. My own impression is that when the matter is sifted the substantial indebtedness to predecessors will be laid bare. Nevertheless there remains a large and preponderating part where Ehrlich is really original or novel. Ehrlich possesses an intimate knowledge of the sacred language in which he is equaled by the fewest of the living. Sometimes he seems to know altogether too much. He corrects the sacred writers as if they were schoolboys. I for one am willing to overlook all these aspects and idiosyncracies. There is enough in Ehrlich's observations that will challenge admiration. He delves deep beneath the surface. He understands idioms as none other. He brings to the elucidation of the language of the Scriptures recondite examples from out-of-the-way corners. A phrase in the Midrash serves to elucidate an obscurity in the Bible. If one remembers how ill-prepared the average Christian commentator is, how much of his energy is frittered away on questions of date and composition the great importance of Ehrlich's antidote will become apparent to every unbiased student. Verbose he may be at times but he is always interesting. He may fail us when we need him most and a difficult passage will still remain difficult after his work has been consulted but none that peruses his work will go away empty-handed.

Reserving for myself a fuller treatment of the merits of Ehrlich in a learned publication I have deemed it a duty to point out to the lay student of the Scriptures the general character of a work which none can afford to pass by with impunity. Our strictures notwithstandingi the Notes on the Hebrew Bible by Ehrlich will for long constitute a monumental work of which we Jews may be justly proud. We congratulate the author upon the completion of his life work. It is a source of pride to all Jews that Ehrlich is becoming known and appreciated in Christian learned quarters. Let the Jew repay his efforts by purchasing the work. It should be in the library of every rabbi and teacher. For it is a mine of erudition.

The Coming Industry

By Rabbi M. Friedlander, Oakland, Cal.

The man who is occupied with abstractions is seldom credited with understanding of practicalities. The student of transcendental subjects is generally considered unqualified to deal with life's realities. This popular belief has been fully disproved by the practical achievement of the founder and president of the National Farm School in Pennsylvania, the Rev. D. Joseph Krauskopf. Busily occupied with training and directing the thoughts of men in things spiritual he found spare hours to care for the practical welfare of his people, and, seeing in the occupation of the soil the cleanest industry and the surest future he founded a school in which young men are trained for the useful vocation of scientific farming.

Two decades ago Dr. Krauskopf started the propaganda "Back To The Soil," and, as a result of the call, 400 young men have since been equipped with skill and knowledge of cultivating the soil. Seventeen years ago the National Farm School opened with eight students, four teachers, a small farm and scanty facilities, and now the school has a faculty of twelve instructors, 137 students, and buildings, implements, dormitory, live stock and a farm of 400 acres amounting to over one-quarter of a million dollars. This certainly bespeaks the practical usefulness of the undertaking. And when it is shown that many of the graduates of that school have been found capable as heads of other agricultural schools, that some of the graduates have been called into the service of this government to teach American farmers better methods of obtaining richer harvests, that some of them are successfully operating in dairying, stock raising, and landscape gardening, and that thirty of the graduates are today owning and working their own farms, then this school must be regarded as having already passed the period of experiment, and must be recognized as one of the finest and permanent institutions of constructive philanthropy with a moral claim upon the generosity of American Jewry.

Besides holding out a definite career to the poor youth who has otherwise no other outlook than peddling, the school, with ample support, can be made the strongest and surest agency for ameliorating the distressing condition of our people in the congested sections of our large cities. More than once in the past quarter century when the situation of Jewish immigrants who fled to American shores from pogrom-ridden Russia, intolerant Roumania, and poverty-stricken Galicia, became alarming; when their overcrowding our eastern centers evoked restrictive immigration legislation by the government and threatened exhaustion of our resources of aid, means were devised and committees appointed to move and distribute these immigrants in the interior. After considerable output of money and exertion of effort but a very small number of the immigrants were distributed in the interior. The bulk of new arrivals remain, and have remained, in the port cities where they landed, and the problem of relieving the congestion is still vexing our philanthropists, our charities, and our social workers. And this problem will become more aggravating after the close of the present war which is devastating the whole of Europe. Thousands, and tens of thousands left financially crippled, will turn with their families westward in the hope of beginning a new life in the new world. What, then, will we do with these destitute thousands? To ignore them and their helplessness would be a glaring departure from the hitherto unbroken history of Jewish charity. We shall have to help them in their dire need; and will our charitable resources be equal to the situation?

The only agency American Jewry may look to for adequate relief from this critical situation and for a practical solution of this perplexing problem, is the National Farm School. Give that institution required support to enlarge its scope and increase its facilities for a thousand, aye, for two and three thousand poor young men to learn farming, and, before many years, there will be no more so-called Jewish Ghettoes in America, no more immigration problems, and no need of distributing committees. The farm school will take practical care of it all; every graduate will act as a self-appointed distributing agent, each graduate farmer will draw the immigrant to the interior and gradually establish a colony of a thousand or more Jewish tillers of the soil. And it does not take hard figuring to tell how many Jewish tillers of the soil 3,000 graduates from the farm school would distribute and happily settle throughout this vast country. Instead of one Federation of Jewish Farmers of America, consisting of sixty-three branches, scattered through eleven States, with a total membership of 1,500, as reported at the sixth annual conference of the federation in New York City, December last, there will be fifty such federations, with branches in every State of the Union, and a membership of 50,000 in each federation.

This may seem visionary. But when we bear in mind that present-day research and triumph in the field of applied sciences are about to change and revolutionize the whole aspect of the productive industries, our prediction might be regarded as future certainty. Tilling of the soil is to be the one fundamental important industry. The world is more and more fully realizing that mankind is dependent upon Mother Earth. Back of the struggle of nations for more territory is the fear raised by Malthus a century ago that the earth could not supply enough food for an increased population. Improved scientific farming will banish this fear. The application of constantly discovered scientific methods will make the earth yield all the sustenance the race needs. Human ingenuity will not only increase and enrich the harvests of already improved land, but will turn the 40,000,000 acres of arid land in the United States into flourishing fields and blossoming orchards. This will be accomplished by the artificial supply of the essential constituents of plant food, the deficit of which is the cause of more than one-half of the American soil now being barren. It has already been successfully demonstrated how this constituent, nitrogen, can be taken from the air, stored, canned, and shipped to the market as fertilizers of the soil. Indeed, it cannot be disputed that farming is the coming thing. There will be no fear of a dearth of food so long as there will be enough of brain and brawn to produce it; let the National Farm School supply a goodly share of it.

In 1905, when American Jewry celebrated the two hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the settlement of the Jews in the United States, suggestions came from several quarters to commemorate the event by the founding of a university to be supported by the Jews. If consideration of suggestions is still open, we would submit the proposition to enlarge the National Farm School, amplify its faculty, and raise it to the rank of a university. The constant advance of applied science is adding new branches of knowledge and research that are allied with, and indispensable to, the study of agriculture and horticulture. Who, for instance, could have believed that plants were susceptible to the treatment of anesthetics and other chemicals. Today the importance of chemical application is an established fact, it stimulates the protoplasm and hastens the production of fruit and flowers. A university for the study of farming and all its cognate branches supported by the Jews would certainly be recognized by the American public as a great educational acquisition, and would afford a lasting solution to to our own social and economic problems.

We would submit this proposition for consideration to the general committee of the Order B'nai B'rith that will shortly convene in San Francisco. The Order B'nai B'rith is pointing with pride to a number of philanthropic institutions which owe their existence to the order's initiative. To several of them the order is still contributing substantial support. But the B'nail B'rith cannot point to its credit the founding, or supporting, of any one of the great educational institutions in the United States. The time for the Order B'nia B'rith to prominently carry out its preamble of "supporting science" has never been more opportune. Dr. Krauskopf recently said to American Jewry: "The National Farm School is at your service. Take it; utilize it; strengthen it; better it; enlarge it; make it worthy of you." Will the B'nai B'rith take it and make it worthy of the world-wide Jewish organization? Will President Kraus see the way clear to press upon the convention next May to take the initiative for enlarging, bettering, and strengthening the farm school, and raise it to the rank of a university?

The author of the text we quoted above bases his prediction upon a passage in the XXVII chapter of Ezekiel, in which the prophet gives a minute and glowing picture of the commerce of Tyre, then the emporium of the world. The rabbi understands the prophet as seeing much evil in a people bent on commerce, and great blessing in the occupation of the soil. According to that interpretation, there is much similitude of circumstances between that of the people Ezekiel is denouncing and that of many of our people in our day. The world has driven us into the mercantile trade, and we are hugging it. We are designated as a business people, and we stick to the reputation. There are among us too many peddlers, barterers, traffickers and petty trades. There are many, too many, of our people in "businesses" of some pretension who are not fitted for that present-day more advanced vocation; they possess neither the method of modern trades, nor the dignity of a representative merchant. They reflect no credit upon Jewish intelligence, nor upon Jewish business sagacity. Let us make an effort to wean our people away from Schachern; let us help them go "back to the soil." The National Farm School offers this opportunity, let us take it. Let our Jewish philanthropists, upon the initiative of the Order B'nai B'rith, speed the realization of the rabbinical forecast: Assidim Kol Balev Umniyoth Sheyamdu Al Hakarka. In the future all tradesmen will turn to farming.

Premier Receives Jewish Deputation.

A deputation consisting of Deputy Freedman, Advocate Grusenberg and M. Davidson, of Warsaw, was recently received by Premier Goremykin. They related to the Premier the terrible suffering of the Jews in Poland and asked that the government render them assistance. Goremykin promised to do all in his power for the suffering Jews.

Minister of the Interior Maklakoff absolutely refused the request made by many Jewish refugees that they be permitted to settle temporarily outside of the Pale. He said that the Pale is still large enough to contain all the Jews. He did, however, grant permission to the Jewish students who had been studying at foreign universities and who were permitted to take their examinations at Russian universities, to stay outside the Pale during the period of their examinations.

It is said that out of the 257 students that applied for the final examinations in the medical faculty in Kieff, 254 were Jews and only three were Christians.

APPLIED JUDAISM

BORIS D. BOGEN

Supt. United Jewish Charities, Cincinnati, O.

A living social organization must be dynamic in character. It may adhere to certain basic principles, unchangeable and permanent, but in its activities it follows the trend of the times, modifying, altering, extending and expanding in its scope as well as in the very nature of its functions. The Independent Order of B'nai B'rith is undoubtedly answering this conception of a living and developing social organization. Taking as its foundation the concept expressed in its motto, "Benevolence, Brotherly Love and Harmony," it began as a mutual benevolent society, adding to this the element of sociability of its own membership. It has not taken long before the larger problems agitating the Jews of the world have been included in the program of this rapidly-growing social factor of Jewish communal life. With the appreciation of the philanthropic needs of American Jewry, the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith has been in the vanguard in the movement for centralized agencies for handling the different phases of modern charitable effort. The Independent Order of B'nai B'rith should be credited with the initiating and promoting of the most important institutions for the care of dependent children, establishing of the national agency for the care of consumptives, and has shown a generous attiture in co-operating with a number of other institutions, created and maintained for the purpose of helping the dependent classes.

With the growth of the manifold interests, the narrow sphere of mutual aid has been gradually abandoned, and social service in a larger and broader sense has occupied the attention of the B'nai B'rith order. Fraternal in its membership, it has now extended its benevolence and brotherhood to the Jews of all the world, joining every movement that makes for the amelioration of the condition of their suffering brethren.

In this country the most important step taken in this direction was the energetic participation in the Industrial Removal Work, the success of which was due, if not entirely, at least to a great extent, to the personal efforts of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith. It is a purely altruistic organization. There is no material benefit that the members derive from the organization, no death or sickness insurance scheme offered its constituents. It is just a federation of people consecrated to the cause of Applied Judaism, contributing collectively to the different phases of Jewish philanthropy, united and ready to serve in the great campaign to remove the disabilities of the Jews in the different countries, offering help to the needy brethren not only materially, but forming an army of men, equipped with great potential possibilities for constructive personal service.

The achievements of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith in the past can hardly be over-estimated, but today, in the age of specialization, and in the presence of other national organizations attempting to cope with one or the other forms of the Jewish question, it is pertinent to ask, "What is the proper domain of the B'nai B'rith activity, and what particular function is it to serve in the modern Jewish life?" While the constantly increasing numbers joining the order indicates the appreciation of the Jewish public of the importance of this particular organization, it behooves the faithful adherents of the B'nai B'rith idea to recognize that some definite program must be followed, not only for the sake of maintaining the interest of its membership, but also for the better utilization of the individual forces that present possibilities of great service among and for the Jews, a service that no other organization is equipped to offer.

For the last twenty-five years, the Jews in America have developed extensive and efficient agencies for the care of the poor. They are justly considered as a model in the field of charitable relief. They have shown a generosity in support of philanthropic efforts that has given rise to favorable comment from different sources. Nevertheless, in one particular respect, the Jews have been laggards, namely, in the appreciation of the importance of a constructive policy and in the recognition of the necessity of definite knowledge of the existing conditions as well as in the study of true efficiency in their efforts to ameliorate these conditions. This is the keynote of modern philanthropy, and in the case of the Jews, it would open up a treasure of new possibilities in social service that would clear up many a misunderstanding and help to solve the intricate problems of Israel.

To begin with, the American Jewry will have to revise its conception as to the motives of specifically Jewish philanthropy. The idea that the Jews must take care of their own for the sake of maintaining their religion, a purely sectarian attitude, is no more a living argument, nor is the obligation of our ancestors, as expressed in the agreement with Peter Stuyvesant, of any value. The Jews have become part and parcel of this country, they share the responsibilities with the rest of the citizenship, and are entitled to the same privileges. The pride of the Jews that they will never become a burden to the community is an empty phrase today. With all the generous effort of private philanthropy, the larger bulk of the burden of chronic dependency falls upon the state and the municipality. The tie that connects the Jews is not due to the formula of practical reasoning, it lies deeper in the emotional nature of humanity that is responsible for the intensified feeling of kith and kin. There is no need for analyzing the ulterior motives in Jewish philanthropy, nor is there any need for apologizing for the brotherly attitude toward the needy. There must be, however, some reason why the Jews should carry on their philanthropic efforts through specifically Jewish channels, and there must be sufficient grounds to justify this isolated policy of social activity. What are the problems that face the Jewish relief society that can not be equally well coped with by the general charitable organization? Why should there be Jewish hospitals, orphan asylums, homes for the aged, and so forth? What is the particular scope of Jewish educational agencies of the same kind? The argument that Jewish philanthropy deals with recently arrived immigrants is weakening. The recent arrival is no more representing the large majority of the private charitable agencies. The municipality, the state, even the federal government, are extending their scope to the immigrant, and it is only a question of time when the private efforts in this direction will be superfluous.

With all these new developments, Jewish philanthropy, as such, is growing and extending in every direction. The old agencies enlarge and intensify their activities, and are constantly supplemented by new organizations and institutions, called into existence almost everywhere in the country. This phenomenal growth of Jewish philanthropy indicates the demand along these lines, and points to valid reasons why Jewish philanthropic efforts should be directed through specifically Jewish agencies. What these reasons are may be variously interpreted. It may suggest that the problem of Jewish dependency is unique and specific inasmuch as it does not carry along the burden of heredity, and is not characterized by a downward tendency, repelling the reclaiming influences. Though poor and unenlightened, oppressed and disabled, economically, politically and socially, living in isolated districts, the Jews never before presented the lowest strata of society, nor were they inhabitants of the slum districts of the cities. Their difficulties were due to external conditions, which did not, however, succeed in crushing the spirit of mental and moral integrity throughout the centuries. Nay. Possibly the very disadvantages of the Jews in fighting for the rights of existence were responsible for the strengthening of the inner powers, that express themselves in the indomitable aspiration for higher ideals of achievements. If this assumption is correct, it follows that the philanthropic efforts among Jews is capable of better results than are to be looked for in the general field of charitable endeavor. Then again, neglect in this direction cannot fail to create a new strata among the Jews, unreclaimable, and presenting a permanent waste of society. The responsibility for such a situation would rest directly with the American Jewry. In other words, we are dealing with the prevention of the formation of a real slum situation, rather than the reclaiming of a slum, inherited from former generations. The problem is both manifold and difficult. Spasmodic effort, and mere treatment of symptoms, by establishing relief agencies, institutions, and so forth and cannot be considered a wise method.

With the great task lying before us, we cannot afford to waste our time in duplication and working at cross purposes. The time has come when the Jews of this country ought to take an inventory of the forces available for grappling with the problem. They ought to be in position to formulate the needs of the different communities, and to adopt a definite policy in coping with the situation. Nothing short of a scientific study of the entire field must be undertaken before 100% efficiency can be achieved. This study of the existing communal needs and examination into the agencies of social service is not only important in determining the future course of activity, but in itself ought to present a fascinating field for social endeavor, and awaken an interest for social betterment among those elements of our population who have been estranged from Jewish influences, and who have outgrown the merely sentimental motives for social service.

Here and there a beginning has already been made. Scientific surveys of some particular phases of Jewish social service have been attempted. The national conference of Jewish charities has for years presented studies along this direction. Thus the subjects of placing out children, tuberculosis, wife desertion, and so forth, were presented at the conference for discussion, but in all instances it was the work of individuals, rather than that of an organization, and it appealed to the professional but failed to receive the cooperation of the public. In some communities the leaders have already awakened to the need of a social survey, but so far no practical facilities have been brought into play. An interesting instance can be cited of a community in the middle west where a social worker of another city was invited to survey the local field of philanthropic effort. The results of a two weeks' study were presented before a gathering of persons interested in the Jewish life of this particular community. It created considerable comment, as it revealed conditions, unnoticed by the residents, which were taken as criticisms of the management in the different organizations. With all this, however, it did not take long before the community endeavored to meet the deficiencies that were pointed out, and strenuous efforts were made to improve the social service. Unfortunately the fact that this survey had to be done by a stranger, that it was only superficial because of the short time that was devoted to it, prevented it from rendering the desired effects. It omitted the most important factors, the utilization of personal service in making the survey, thus to a great extent defeating its very purpose.

On the other hand, another experiment is being tried now in a city where all these considerations are taken into account. In one community, a group of prominent educated women have recently formed an organization, known as the "Bureau of Jewish Social Service." The purpose of this organization is the study of the different phases of social service, with the emphasis laid upon the Jewish problem, endeavoring to ascertain the existing needs and secure the co-operation of the existing agencies for proper handling of the situation, also the establishment of new agencies if they should be found necessary. This organization meets in weekly conferences where the matters for consideration are presented in the form of papers and reports. Thus the first topic taken up for discussion was that of infant welfare work. After acquainting themselves with the scope of this practical phase of social service, the organization joined as a member of the National Infant Welfare Association, studied the activities of the different infant welfare associations of this country and in surveying the Jewish field in their own city found considerable ground uncovered by all other agencies.

Thus the Jewish Infant Welfare Society was launched. Weekly reports from the Board of Health are taken up in regard to Jewish births. Congratulations are sent to the mothers of the infants, enclosing subscription blanks to those who can afford, and literature that explains the purposes of the organization and offers of advice and assistance to those who are in need. These letters are followed up by the visiting committee, who visit each and every case, endeavoring to enlist the interest of the mothers in the work of the organization. A welfare station is conducted by the circle, in charge of a physician and nurse, where infants are given medical aid and the mothers advice and instruction, as well as tickets for certified milk, given either at reduced rates or free of charge as the case may be. Eventually, this organization will have a register of every Jewish baby in the city, and during the summer months it intends to provide facilities in the country for the proper care of the babies that may need special attention.

Another field of investigation of the Bureau of Jewish Social Service is that of the extent and character of feeble mindedness among Jewish children of the city. As in the first instance, the study of the general problem was first undertaken. The literature pertaining to this particular subject was read and discussed, and the methods of investigation of similar subjects were consulted, before a comprehensive questionnaire was worked out, which is used in the examination of each and every case. A list of Jewish school children, retarded in the public schools of the city was compiled. The members of the organization made a study of the homes of the children, and a medical and physical examination is made by a physician to ascertain the exact condition of each child and the causes responsible for its retard action. While this study is far from being completed, the examinations that were made point towards a problem that has been heretofore neglected, and also suggest a number of possible means for helping the unfortunates. The program of the Bureau of Jewish Social Service will be continuously expanded, till it will cover the entire Field of Jewish Social Endeavor.

Another organization still more characteristic of the trend of the times is one consisting of men and known as the Jewish Efficiency Bureau. This organization comprises progressive business men and professionals, interested in the modern creed of efficiency. These gentlemen are making an examination into the methods of managing of the different Jewish social agencies of the city. They are prying into the methods of budget making, purchasing, and so forth, looking not only for economy, but also for efficiency. They make enquiries as to the per capita cost of the inmates of the different institutions, cost of collection of funds, as well as the cost of distribution. It is the intention of this organization to collect sufficient data as to the actual workings of the local institutions, compare them with similar institutions in other cities, and thus eventually be equipped to propose plans for reorganization and improvement wherever it is needed. There can be no doubt that these attempts on the part of the community to get an intelligent appreciation of the problems on hand, as well as the desire for working out a definite program in the field of social service can not fail to enhance the progress of the awakening of the social consciousness.

What is done in one community can be easily repeated in another and there is no reason why this particular inquiry into Jewish Social phenomena should not be undertaken on a nation-wide scale. If this movement is to grow, there is no better agency for its initiation and promotion than the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith. A general program can be worked out by the national organization, which will have no difficulty in enlisting the co-operation of experts in different lines of social endeavor. Special committees can be appointed by the local lodges who could arrange conferences, study the different phases of the problem, investigate the conditions of the existing agencies, elaborate a definite system of personal social service for the members of the order and eventually become the center of efficiency in Jewish philanthropy. This program is in complete accord with the platform of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith, which, reduced to its essentials, spells Applied Judaism.

Jewish War Statistics in Germany

Immediately after the breaking out of the war the Union of German Jews, in order to obtain authentic records of the participation of the Jews in the war, issued a request to the Jewish public to report to it all kinds of information bearing upon the subject. Similar arrangements were also made by a number of other organizations. For the purpose of the centralization of these aims a special committee for war statistics was formed in which the following Jewish organizations were represented: Union of German Jews, Grand Lodge for Germany, I. O. B. B.; Bureau of Statistics of the Jews, Central Association of German Citizens of State of the Jewish Faith, German Israelitish Congregational Union, Zionistic Societies of Germany, Committee for War Aid of the Berlin B'nai B'rith Lodges, Society for the Defense Against Anti-Semitism, Cartel-Coutent, Cartel of Jewish Societies. As the material in the archives of the Union of German Jews and the other organizations constantly increased it was found necessary to form a separate bureau to which the committee could turn over the work of gathering and arranging the statistics.

THE BIBLE in the PUBLIC SCHOOL

By S. HECHT, Rabbi Congregation B'NAI B'RITH, Los Angeles

In view of the renewed efforts that are making in this and in other states of our Union to introduce or re-introduce the Bible in the public schools, I deem it timely and fitting to set forth in the columns of the B'nai B'rith News my protest against this proposition, and to create in the minds of your numerous readers a similar spirit, and, if possible, a determination by united efforts to defeat this plan, and thus to safeguard our public school system, the strongest bulwark of our government, the most successful exponent of true Democracy.

The Bible is the greatest, grandest and most useful book in the literature of any age, of any language, of any people. The Bible has many enemies; its worst enemies being its alleged best friends; the men and women who boldly set up the claim that it is the direct emanation of God, dictated into the pen of his chosen instruments; the men and women who take every word of the Bible in its literal sense, who deny its human source, nor stop to investigate and clear up apparent incongruities, discrepancies and contradictions; the men and women who, however rational they may be in the practical, every day affairs, do not hesitate to accept as unquestioned truth the many miraculous statements with which that book abounds.

No wonder that Robert Ingersoll spoke and wrote flippantly about "the mistakes of Moses," and that his followers are seeking to discredit the Bible. But I hold that if half the care were bestowed upon discovering the beauties, the ethical and literary value of the book, as there is being devoted to the discovery of alleged errors, those arguments for which their sponsors claim irrefutable logic, would lose their force, and every one would readily understand why such eminent thinkers, scholars and students as Hegel, and Huxley, and Bacon, and Webster, and Ruskin, and Carlyle, and Emerson, and others of that stamp, too numerous to mention, ascribed to the Bible inestimable and perennial merit.

There is a widespread, a lamentable ignorance concerning the book, and both the so-called liberal and orthodox circles furnish a considerable contingent to the army of these ignorants. The great value of the Bible does not depend upon the belief in its inerrancy (as this word is usually understood), the superiority which it claimed for it lies in the indisputable fact that it is the great text book on Righteousness, that it is a literary treasure house of transcendent wealth, that it is a model of diction and language. Only, of course, the study of this book must be undertaken with a fair, unbiased mind, and with the realization of the fact that in its contents it mirrors the conditions of the times, at which, and the peoples, for whom, it was written.

And yet, in spite of all these merits which might be indefinitely increased, the Bible is not a book that should be used in our public schools. Our schools are established by the state for the benefit of all children alike. Religious bias must not be inculcated in the youthful mind in any form, under any pretext. The fundamental law upon which this government rests is positive in this requirement. With wise foresight the fathers and founders of this Republic provided for the separation of church and state, and this not because they loved the church less, but because they loved freedom or liberty of conscience more. They wisely believed with Frederick the Great, the liberal ruler of Germany, to let every one secure salvation according to his own fashion. They were religious men; religious in the ideal sense of this much abused term; they did not claim monopoly of righteousness in the teachings of any one religious system; they freely recognized and admitted the good in every religion, but while they respected all, they did not mean to favor any.

Now I believe firmly in my religion because it satisfies my reason; but I do not condemn as unreasoning any one who does not share my religious convictions. My Christian brother also firmly believes in his religion for the same reason practically; but he does not stop there. He boldly and unreasoningly maintains that any one who does not believe as he believes, does not accept his dogmas is eternally damned. And so solicitous is he for the salvation of the other that, regardless of the work incumbent upon him in his own religious household, he would forcibly cram down the throat of every one outside his church, the doctrines that do not agree with the [illegible] apparatus of the dissenter.

[illegible] a supreme disregard of that benefi- [illegible]amental law of this country which recognizes no Jew, no Christian, no Mohammedan as such, nor the Unbeliever as such, the anxious Christian with more zeal than discretion persists in denominating this country as a Christian country. I readily grant that every Christian minister should properly bend his best efforts towards teaching and preaching Christianity to the men and women, to the young and the old in his church. I would consider him derelict in his duty did he not read and explain the Bible to those under his religious charge; but I would deem it an unwarranted assumption of authority for him, or for any one to dictate or attempt to dictate the policy of the common schools along the lines of his or any one's else religious predilection. In other words, I am contributing towards the maintenance of the schools in which my child is to be fitted, not for church, nor for synagog, nor for mosque, but for American citizenship, in the same proportion with every other citizen, and while I cheerfully bear that tax I am neither willing, nor expected to be taxed for having my child taught any denominational religion.

But, urges the gentle, kind-hearted minister of the Gospel, I have no intention to force Christianity into the curriculum of the schools; I know the fundamental law, and I respect it and mean to support and uphold it. I merely want the Bible to be read in the schools, because I believe that it is their province to fit the coming generation for good American citizenship, and because without the knowledge of the Bible it is impossible for the young to develop into such citizens, and since the Jew, equal with the Catholic and the Protestant, believes in the Bible as a guide to correct lives, to purity and morality, I could see no good reason for withholding that boon from them. Surely the law is not opposed to religion; it is against sectarianism, and the Bible is not a sectarian book. Is that really so? Are we all agreed that the Bible is not a sectarian book? Then why is it that the Christian finds or reads into the Bible things which the Jew could not find in it, the Jew who ought to know, having given it to the world, the Jew who might "search the Scripture" as he would?

The advocate of the Bible in the public school is unable to meet this argument, and he admits that the interpretations of the Scripture might vary with the interpreters. But what objection, says he, could be urged against reading the Bible without comment. None except that such reading would be a waste of time, unprofitable and useless, would, ultimately have the tendency of bringing the Bible into disrepute. You might as well read Chaucer to the children of the grammar grades without explanation, and expect them to gain literary knowledge from such a course, as to expect a high degree of morality and purity and rightness in children from the reading of the Bible without comment. And in the name of religion, and for the sake of my admiration and veneration of the Bible, I would protest against its being reduced to a mere foil for an unintelligible, soulless mechanism.

But even yet these ardent friends of the Bible have not exhausted their resources. With a persistence worthy of a better cause, these champions of humanity, working for the salvation of the souls, and diplomatically evading the main issue, argue that there are certainly passages in the Bible which cannot, under any circumstances, be considered objectionable. Let us therefore, they say, join forces, appoint a commission composed of representatives of all creeds and all denominations, and let this commission select from the Biblical literature such portions of the Bible as may have the unanimous approval of the several representatives, such portions that admit of no sectarian ground of cleavage, and given them a place in the curriculum of the public schools.

There are many reasons for rejecting this plan, however innocent it may seem, but I will content myself by stating one only, and that is that the tactit concession of the sectarian character of the book in some parts could not remove that sectarian character in another part.

This country is not a Christian country, all the specious pleas and averments to the contrary notwithstanding, unless it be assumed that the majority of the people constituting the nation, make it such.

They quote European countries in which religious instruction is a prerequisite in public education, forgetting that the governments of those countries, unlike the government of the United States recognizes an established church, and that, for this reason, the cases are not analogous.

Complaints are being made that the young people at our colleges and universities are woefully ignorant of the Bible. I believe that this complaint is justified, and no one regrets this fact more than the present writer; but this complaint is a direct indictment of the church and its servants, and not a just reproach against the public schools and their sponsors. Nor is it fair to claim that because there are some men and women who ardently advocate the reading of the Bible in the schools, their opinion should have sufficient weight in the matter, for the reason that on the other hand there are also men and women who loudly approve the exclusion. To decide the pending question along such lines would be as just and consistent as the plea of the man charged with theft. The plaintiff offered witnesses who had seen the act. The defendant offered in his behalf ten times as many witnesses who had not seen him steal.

Time and time again the highest tribunals in the several states of our Union have ruled against the reading of the Bible in the schools. But the Christian clergy, instead of accepting this verdict rendered in accordance with the law, instead of bending their efforts towards making the Bible familiar through the church, the home and the religious school, seek to circumvent the law, try to heap ridicule upon the men who have faithfully performed their sworn duty, and thus to drag down the judiciary in the esteem of the public.

I repeat, that religion, in its present accepted meaning, and the Bible, its text book, should be fostered in the home, in the Sunday school and in the church; and if it be argued that the average Sunday school teacher is inadequate, how could it be expected that the public school teacher should be better qualified for the important task.

Let all who love the Bible and reverence it redouble their efforts in making its teachings familiar to the people the old and the young, the men and the women, the boys and the girls; but let us all who also love this country and its institutions unite, for the sake of that love, and when the question concerns an interference with our schools, in saying: "Hands off," and try to enforce it, too.

We Jews—What Are We?

By S. N. DEINARD

We Jews—what are we? This is not meant as a paradoxical question. It is put in very good faith. The twelve millions of us or more, scattered over the world, and all known as Jews—what are we? Are we a nation, a race, a religious body, or none of these, and something else?

There are Jews who call themselves German, French, English, Polish, American; yet they all are Jews. There are blonde Jews, brunette Jews, very dark-skinned Jews, yea, black Jews, with all kinds and shapes of skulls, noses, eyes, color and form of hair. There are Jews who believe in ghosts, signs and portents, incantations, amulets, miraculous cures; and Jews who are rationalists, agnostics, yea, even atheists. And they all are Jews. Surely no one would read a Zangwill, or a Nordan, out of the fold. What are we, then?

We are not a nation. We lack all the elements of national life. We have no state, no territory, no government, no laws or other political institutions of our own. The fact is, most Jews do not wish to be classed as a separate nation. They prefer to be known as Americans, Germans, Frenchmen, Poles, etc. That ought to settle the matter. True, once the Jews were a nation, and long after they ceased to be that, they continued to cherish the hope of renationalization. It was a strong element of their faith. And a goodly number of Jews are still hopeful of such a consummation, and are working toward it—I mean the Zionists, in whose hopes and wishes I share. But the wish for renationalization, even if it were the wish of all Jewry, does not make us a nation now, living as we are under other flags. And the majority of Jews do not even wish a change of political or national status. Surely, we cannot speak of ourselves as a nation.

Nor can we speak of ourselves as a separate race. Dr. Maurice Fishberg, in his scholarly work, "The Jews—A Study in Race and Environment," has, I believe, conclusively proved that there is no such thing as a separate Jewish race. Having accumulated and examined such a mass of data as no investigator before him had, his conclusion is: "There is no more justification for speaking of ethnic unity among the modern Jews, or of a 'Jewish race,' than there is justification to speak of ethnic unity of the Christians, or. Mohammedans or of a Unitarian, Presbyterian, or Methodist race. There are more differences to be seen in the anthropological type of the Jews in the Caucasus when compared with their co-religionists in Tunis than between each of these groups of Jews and the peoples around them. A considerable portion of Jews in Eastern Europe have more Slavonic blood flowing in their veins than so-called 'Semitic' blood, whatever this may imply.

"We have seen that today the bulk of the Jews who have lived for centuries in Africa present predominantly an African physical type; those in Asia are mostly of Asiatic type, and the European Jews are mostly of the anthropological types met with among the European races." (p. 515.)

The reader of Dr. Fishberg's book cannot help feeling that the author has approached his subject without bias or prejudice, but as a purely scientific investigation. His conclusions, therefore, are quite trustworthy.

True, the word "race" is used in a very wide and loose sense. We often hear of the "Irish race," and the "Anglo-Saxon race." But in that regard the Jews are even unlike the Irish, for by no stretch of imagination can we think of black-skinned Irish men, like the black Jews of India, and the Falashas of Abyssinia.

Are we, then, a religious body, a sect, or denomination? Consider the divergences of belief or unbelief among Jews. Can we by any flight of fancy bridge over the religious chasm that yawns between a Nordau and a Hassidic rabbi of Bukowina? Can we expect the same religious doctrine from a Dr. Hirsch and a Rabbi Wolf Margolies? We might just as well expect religious team-work of Rev. Jenkins Lloyd Jones and the Catholic Archbishop of Chicago. To call Dr. G. Deutsch and Rabbi Aaron Teitelbaum members of the same faith is simply to play fast and loose with the word faith.

What, then, are we? Only the ideas implied in "B'nai B'rith" will satisfactorily answer the question. We are a brotherhood. As such our career began, and as such our career must continue. We began as "B'nai B'rith," or as sons of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, the first parties to the "B'rith." Such is our tradition. True, members of other families have at all times, from the very beginning, entered our brotherhood. Entire tribes of non-Israelitish origin joined themselves to the descendants of Abraham in very early times, and became assimilated with them; and the process continued throughout our history, sometimes on a larger and sometimes on a smaller scale. But they all became "Sons of the Covenant," members of Israel's brotherhood.

The brotherhood had its ritual, the Torah, its various ceremonies, its "rite of initiation," its pass-word, "Shema Yisrael," its regalia and paraphernalia; the tallis and the typhillin; the succa, esrog and lulav; the matzos and morer. And although a good deal of the ritual and ceremony has of late years been given up by a goodly portion of the brotherhood, and by some even in their entirety, the vast majority are still loyal to the essential principles of the brotherhood of the "B'rith"—Mutual helpfulness, defense, and protection, and the cultivation and spread of the ideals of justice, liberty and truth. To cultivate high ideals has been the chief object of the brotherhood of Israel. One such ideal is religion, the pure and positive faith of Israel's prophets, the noblest of all ideals, the sum and substance of them all.

But on this last point opinions may differ. Within our brotherhood the greatest latitude of thought, the widest difference of opinion is permitted. There are those who consider the restoration of our national-political life as the worthiest object; others, the revival of our national or spiritual culture; still others, a more active and vigorous participation in the great national and world movements of our time, having no political and cultural interests of our own. But all consider loyalty to our brotherhood as the chief requisite of our Jewishness.

Thus the Independent Order B'nai B'rith is the exemplification of the true character of Israel at large. It serves as a model, a reminder, an object lesson. The ideal Israel is more than a nation, race, or sect; it is a brotherhood—"B'nai B'rith."

JEWISH CONVERTS RECOGNIZED

Jews who have become converted to the Lutheran faith have at last become recognized as Christians by the new minister of education, M. Ignatieff. A number of Jews wishing to enter universities in Russia were prevented from doing so on account of their religion, and they became Lutherans, but in spite of their conversion were refused admission, their conversion not being recognized by the minister of education. Now, by a decree of the department, all such converts will be recognized as Christians and will be given the privilege of entering universities without restriction.

According to the latest statistics, the number of Jewish war refugees and exiles at Warsaw is 110,000. The vast majority of them received accommodation in private houses through the kindness of the local Jews, but many thousands were placed in special shelters.

REMINISCENCES

By S. WOLFENSTEIN - - - CLEVELAND, OHIO

The worthy Secretary of our Executive Committee wrote to me in reply to my inquiry about the subject of my contribution to this number of the B'nai B'rith News, that "to write a reminiscence touching upon B'nai B'rith affairs would be not only relished by the readers of this paper, but would also prove instructive and would have much historic value."

Having retired since November, 1913, from my activity as Superintendent of the Cleveland Jewish Orphan Asylum, I am frequently indulging during some of my leisure hours in reminiscences. Many of them are reviving sorrows and heartaches, but I would be ungrateful to Kind Providence to forget the hours and days of joy and happiness which I enjoyed during my lifetime. The recollection of many evenings which I spent in the B'nai B'rith Lodge rooms, the memories of the brothers with whom I had become befriended through B'nai B'rith affairs, belong to the happiest and most pleasant of all my life.

Before mine eyes rises the figure of Isidor Bush, small in size and lithe with its characteristic head of bushy hair. I had been hardly six months in this country, which had appeared to me and my departed wife like a barren desert, when, it was in 1870, I first met him. He was to us like an oasis in the wilderness. I could talk with him about Prague and Vienna, about Luzzato, Kompert, Ludwig August Frankel and so many men of letters. He knew them all; he had corresponded with them and had published some of their first writings in his "Jahrbuecher," which he had edited in Vienna, while he was a mere youth. How happy he was, that I possessed almost all the volumes that had appeared. In parenthesis I must say that I have but a few of them left. Upon request of my esteemed friend, Dr. G. Deutsch, I gave a number of them to the library of the Hebrew Union College of Cincinnati, to complete their collection, of which several "Jahrgaenge" were missing.

A splendid sketch of the life of Isidor Bush, presented by Brother Jacob Furth before the Missouri Historical Society, has been republished in a recent number of this paper. Mention is made in this sketch, that Brother Bush had framed the Endowment Law of District No. 2, I. O. B. B. When I first called on Brother Bush, I found him at work on sheets over sheets covered with figures. These were the plans for a Covenant Endowment which he was preparing for our B'nai B'rith District. He was the actuary of a life insurance company and his pen for this Endowment of $1,000.00 for each member of the District to be paid after his death, had been figured in accordance with the tables of vital statistics of life insurance business.

After he had explained to me the scheme, I told him that I totally disliked the entire idea of an Endowment, stating that I had joined the order for its higher aims and not to get a life insurance.

He declared, that personally, he was not at all enthusiastic for it either, but, said he, "we are threatened to lose our membership; the Lodges are clamoring for it."

The Cincinnati Lodges had started and were upholding a local endowment to the amount of $2,000.00 per member and the membership of the District envied the Cincinnati Lodges, wanting to have one, too, satisfied that it be for $1,000.00.

The ignominious end of the Cincinnati venture after not very many years is well known.

I remember when I examined the figures of Mr. Bush, having been somewhat of a mathematician during my early school years, that I was surprised finding that he had figured the rate of interest on investments at 8 per cent, but I was told that this was the prevailing rate. My objection, that there was no security for the maintenance of such a rate in the future, he considered possible but not probable. It was but a few years after the endowment plan came into operation that the rate of interest was lowered to 6 per cent, which, of course, had to affect very seriously the original plan.

Another feature of it seemed to me rather problematic. That was the average rate of the members, upon which Mr. Bush had figured. The members of Missouri Lodge, to which I then belonged, appeared to me almost all much older than I had been. I was then 31 years old. The ages had been ascertained by the reports of the Secretaries of the various Lodges. How unreliable they were, I do not need to comment upon. When, a few years later, a new canvass for securing the right ages of the membership had to be made, it was discovered that Mr. Bush had calculated on an average age of at least five years less than the actual average had been.

When the plan had safely passed the stormy debates of the District Grand Lodge Convention and was submitted to the single Lodges for adoption, there was great joy in Missouri Lodge and probably in all Lodges of the District. I was in the chair of the Lodge, serving my term as President.

Not a single word was spoken against the Endowment Law to be enacted, when, leaving the chair, I addressed the Lodge, expressing my utter disapproval of the scheme. I think it was only due to the fact that a large number of the members belonged to my congregation that I was listened to respectfully—but, of course, without avail to changing the sentiment of the Lodge.

My vocabulary of German-American slang was enriched on that evening. When, after my address, I resumed the chair, I overheard one of the older members saying: "Er is a greenhorn." He was much embarrassed, when after the meeting I asked him to tell me what it meant to be "a greenhorn."

During the many years, during which in the Grand Lodge proceedings of our District, as well as of other Districts, "Endowment" had held the center of discussions and frequently most acrimonious discussions, endangering the very existence of our order, it was to me a source of much satisfaction that I had opposed the insurance feature, of which to get rid, we had to struggle so hard. How many heartaches it caused our good Brother Bush will be in remembrance of some of our older brethren, who have seen him at many a session of the Grand Lodge, standing on the platform reading his anual report, while tears were trickling down his cheeks. It would be more than a satisfaction to our departed brother, that the Endowment, which he had planned with such care and solicitude has survived, being now ably managed by his co-workers, Brothers Jacob Furth and Martin A. Marks. To all appearances it will terminate, though reduced from $1,000.00 to $800.00, when the family of the last surviving brother will have received its share.

The memory of another brother of no less distinction is indelible in my mind. His friendship will be sacredly cherished by me to the end of my days. Leo. N. Levi of sainted memory. Over a decade is past since he has been called hence, while he filled the position of President of our Order with such dignity and efficiency. He will ever remain in grateful remembrance of the entire Brotherhood

Brother Jacob Furth mentioned in the eulogy which he wrote for the Jewish Orphan Asylum magazine and which was published in the February number of 1904, that the departed brother had been greatly interested in the problem of taking care of our orphans and that he held the opinion that better results could be obtained by keeping orphan children in families, than rearing them in asylums. I can testify to the fact that Brother Levi had changed his opinion during the last few years before his untimely death. He expressed himself to that effect in several letters addressed to me after he had moved to New York. He had a plan under consideration to establish a home for dependent and neglected children, to be conducted under the cottage plan.

The two days which he spent with me in the fall of 1903 will never be forgotten by me. Explaining to me his project, he used an expression which was so characteristic of the man. He said: "They have in New York several good and big institutions for the care of orphans, but there are," said he, "a very large number of girls and boys—especially boys—whom they cannot receive, and who are growing up to become a disgrace and a danger to our people. They are abandoned like waste is thrown into the ash-barrel. Give me the ash-barrel," he said. "I want to take care of them." For this class of children designated as delinquent and defective, he desired to erect a home. We talked over the plans in all their details. I drafted for him several sketches and designs for cottages and other buildings. He marked every sheet with his and my notations, placing the bulky manuscript in a large envelope. It might have been found among his papers and probably gave the impetus to the starting of the Jewish Protectory in New York, which was organized a year or two after his death.

The second day of his visit was Saturday. Brother Levi participated in our worship and I invited him to address the children. He was an orator by the grace of God, but he told the children that it was the first time in his life that he felt embarrassed when facing an audience. He did justice to himself. Indeed, he did justice to himself and to his Maker in all the stations of his life.

Blessed be his memory!

The B'nai B'rith Should Not Be a Secret Order

By ALFRED M. COHEN

Cincinnati, Ohio

The B'nai B'rith News has honored me with a request for a contribution to its special number and leaves me free to select my subject. A hundred topics of various degrees of Jewish interest occur to my mind, which I might treat in my humble way without fear of encountering opposition or giving rise to argument from any source whatsoever. But there looms before my vision a question, concerning which much has been written, sometimes not in the most fraternal spirit, of supreme importance to the B'nai B'rith and the larger constituency of which it is the champion, which bids me avail myself in its behalf, of the opportunity offered by the News on the eve of the assembling of representatives of all the Lodges of the Order in quinquennial Convention. I realize that under constitutional limitations, the change of which I shall write, can be proposed only if recommended by a District Grand Lodge, but perhaps some time during the Convention "the good of the Order" may be discussed, when the seed may be planted, which shall ripen within the next five years into a healthy growth of popular favor for an innovation which, in my opinion, is absolutely essential if the B'nai B'rith aspires to the place in Jewry which its principles, its purposes, its achievements, and its splendid leadership, entitle it.

The change to which I refer is the ABOLISHMENT OF SECRECY.

Why is the B'nai B'rith a secret Order?

For one reason only. It was organized as such. Why it was thus organized, would take a long time to tell, and even then, all who think they know would not be in agreement. But whatever the reasons may have been, they are long since outlived, as have been many others of the features of the earlier days. We would not if we could, and we could not if we would, return to the initiation ceremonies of thirty, forty or fifty years ago. The further back we trace, the more prolific and profuse were the rites incident to membership. All, all are gone, save a mere shell of secrecy, which amounts to nothing among ourselves, but which continues to make of us a secret society in the eyes of all the rest of mankind.

What is the objection to the B'nai B'rith being known as a secret fraternity? Need it be ashamed to be ranked beside the Masonic, the Odd Fellows and the Knights of Pythias?

Know you not that the B'nai B'rith is composed exclusively of Jews? And surely you know that these other fraternities include in their membership men of every shade of religious belief.

The Jew too frequently is charged with being a state within a state. Why give color to the charge, by permitting the Jews' most influential organization to longer continue as a secret society?

Instead of grouping the B'nai B'rith with the Masonic, the Odd Fellows and the Knights of Pythias fraternities, array it side by side with the Knights of Columbus, the A. P. A., and some few other secret Orders which make as a condition to membership that the applicant must be affiliated with a particular religious belief, otherwise he is barred.

How like you the new Company in which you find our Order?

Who believe that a secret order, composed exclusively of people of a single religion, has not among its purposes some that are not set forth in its printed formula? Very few, if any.

Why should a Jewish secret order be immune from the suspicions which attach to similar societies of non-Jews?

Has it been the fate of the Jew to be judged by a standard more favorable to himself than the non-Jew? Is it not a veritable commonplace that the Jew to be as good as his non-Jewish neighbors in their esteem, must be infinitely better?

Then why expect our Order to escape the penalty imposed upon people of a single religion, who band themselves under an obligation of secrecy?

If the B'nai B'rith of today were the B'nai B'rith of its founders, there would be little objection to its being a secret society. It would then loom but seldom, and then only insignificantly, in the public eye. The world cares but little under what auspices men meet for social recreation; to relieve distress, whether among themselves or in a wider sphere; to visit the sick; to bury their dead. But when men are organized to influence public opinion; to revise the decrees of Kings and Emperors; to protest before the Executive and the Legislative Departments of a Republic against pogroms and ukases, and intervene in affairs of state, to the extent of saying that this country shall cease its treaty relations with a foreign power, because that foreign power discriminates against American citizens of the same religious belief as that held by its members, such an organization must expect to be searched by those with whose views it conflicts, and it cannot be searched if it is a secret society; and if it cannot be searched, its power and its influence must, will and does suffer and wane—suffer and wane, much, very much.

Two reasons have been given for the retention of secrecy. The first is that the B'nai B'rith has prospered quite reasonably, as it is constituted, and it is best to let well enough alone.

None will deny that the Order has done fine work along charitable, philanthropic and elemosynary lines. In these departments of its activity, the fact that it is a secret society will prove but a slight hindrance. Whatever success it has achieved in the larger work—that of championing the cause of the Jew whenever and wherever the Jew stands in need of a champion, has been wrought IN SPITE of the fact that it is a secret Order, and may I add, with thought removed as far as possible from underrating the service that the Order has done in this behalf, that its efforts have always been united with those of other bodies that are of non-secret character.

The second reason given for retention of secrecy, is that the human mind is so constructed as to be attracted and allured by that which is mysterious and hidden; that the imagination craves for something upon which to feed.

I am deeply impressed with the beauty and sublimity of our initiation ceremony. I would not abolish one word of it that is printed. The fact that the ceremonial appears in print, makes it open to all, of course. I would banish the small part that is not printed—the secret word or two making up the pass word and the signs and signals with which only the very fewest are familiar. I would retain all else and entitle it "Introductory Ceremony," thereby preserving all that is worth while, and in fact, all save less than a hundred words. None should be admitted to membership who are not thus introduced, because to many it is a religious exercise all too rare in their lives. Nor would I deprive the non-member of the opportunity of listening to it if he would come to hear. Can those who believe most thoroughly in this ceremonial, doubt its power to bring into the fold, those who have been enthralled by its fervor? Its influence will not be less, because it is delivered in the open.

And when, after our beloved B'nai B'rith is no longer a secret society, we have occasion to make appeal in the high places among the nations, on behalf of our co-religionists, that they may be accorded the rights of men in countries where they are not recognized as men; that they be not made victims of the mad fury of the mob in countries where the Jew is made the scape-goat of cowardly miscreants in power, to divert from themselves the dire consequences of their own evil; or that the gates of free America and England shall not be barred against the victim of persecution through tests that are not true gauges of worthiness; or if the appeal be in any of countless conceivable directions, it will be made by a body which is open to the strictest scrutiny of the harshest critic of the Jew and every thing with which he is connected. Then, no longer will our Order be subject to the insinuation that it has purposes which may not be written in its constitution and by-laws.

THE B'NAI B'RITH HOSPITAL TRAIN.

On Sunday forenoon, March 7, an inspection was held of the hospital train of the District Grand Lodge No. 8 at the Steglitz freight depot. Among those present were the Grand President Privy Judicial Counsellor Timendorfer, Dr. James Simon, Court Counsellor Walter, possessor of the Red Cross medal, Commercial Counsellor Stein, Police Counsellor Atzrath, Privy Judicial Counsellor Dr. Eugen Fuchs, etc. The train comprises about 26 cars, 21 of which are devoted to hospital purposes, accommodating about 200 wounded. The equipment, which was furnished by the medical magazine in Berlin, is exemplary in every respect, special care was taken to provide good comfortable laying down places for the wounded. Dr. Staub of Breslau acts as the chief physician and he is assisted by two Berlin physicians, Dr. Hirschlaff and Dr. Rosenthal. The number of attendants is 28, including 4 lady nurses. Lieutenant D. Knopp accompanies the train as the military attendant.

AN APPEAL to the MODERN JEWISH STUDENT

By RABBI JOSEPH RAUCH, :: :: :: Louisville, Kentucky

The world has always had privileged classes. In every generation there have been individuals whom fortune singled out for special favors. These have been endowed with gifts denied to others. These gifts have invariably meant power but this power has not been the same at all times. It has been physical strength at one time and material wealth at another. In one age it has taken the form of brilliant intellect, in another of deep spirituality. At times we meet it in the form of the daring soldier, at others in the guise of the modest scholar. Whatever its form it is always an advantage to the fortunate possessor. It is something the few have and the many desire.

The American students are among the privileged classes of our day. The gifts within America are not identical with those of other countries. National standards determine largely national privileges. Israel of old honored her citizens when she bestowed upon them the crown of priesthood. Sanctity being the great national ideal, this token gave the possessor the respect and dignity towards which we all aspire. Europe gives a title to her illustrious citizens and thereby elevates those who have rendered great services and are entitled to special distinction. Official America is not consecrated to the development and propagation of religion, so the crown of priesthood is not within her gift. Nor does she recognize titled aristocracies. This makes it impossible for her to show distinction by separating socially one class of citizens from another. America is a democracy. She has therefore but two gifts to offer: Freedom and Education. The first is the possession of all, the second the privilege of the few. Those who can take advantage of the second and enjoy the first are among the happy children of this land.

There are degrees of good fortune among the happy citizens of this land. Merely to be born here is to have one's lot cast under an auspicious horoscope, for freedom has not yet been attained by all mankind. To many nations liberty is still a distant ideal. A good part of the world still regards it as a beautiful sunbeam playing on the dazzling heights of a distant horizon. Only to the few is liberty a reality. Only a fraction of mankind has been permitted to stand on the holy ground where democracy has built her shrines. China alone counts more enslaved people than are to be found in all the legions of free sons and daughters. To be born, therefore, under a free sky is to be accounted happy. This is our lot as the sons and daughters of a free country.

But not in this lies the uniqueness of America's privileged class. We no longer look upon equality before the law as the highest national ideal. We all have it. Before the law the humblest citizen is on a par with the chief executive of the country. Herein lies the chief glory of a democracy as worked out in the United States. Yet we know full well that there are millions of citizens in this land who are not her privileged sons and daughters though they possess in full every right the statutes provide.

What then is it that constitutes the exalted class in America? It is the privilege of being counted among those fortunate few who are enrolled in the higher centers of learning. What the priest class meant to Israel of old, what the aristocrats mean to Europe even today, that the American college students are to the people of the United States. Upon them is being lavished all that the country has and before them the greatest treasures are opened. In this country of freedom we must pay for everything else while education is practically free. Our educational system works by an inverse ratio. We pay considerably more for the rudiments of our education than for a college course. Every student is a financial loss to the college that trains him. His tuition and incidental fees do not begin to pay for what he receives. Compare the number of students of the American colleges with the many who have never set foot beyond the grade schools and it will be seen that for every student enrolled in a higher school of learning there are thousands who are not. The country has given to all the same amount of freedom, but fortune has kept from many the privilege of higher educational opportunities.

We need but state these facts to realize the debt every student assumes when he enters college, a debt to the country, a debt to those who endow and maintain [illegible] of our institutions of learning and [illegible] parents who make it possible for [illegible] enjoy these rare and splendid opportunities. If ever privilege was the [illegible] of responsibility then the obligation resting upon students is greater than that resting upon any other class of citizens in this land.

But it is not to American students in general that I wish to address myself, but to the American Jewish student. No religion has a better right to speak of its learned class than has Judaism. We know the high regard our religion has always bestowed on the scholar. If we have ever developed any kind of aristocracy it is one of learning. Our kings never stood in the highest esteem of the people. On the other hand the priests and the prophets were always the uncrowned rulers. The immortals in Israel have ever been the scholars of Judaism. To be an authority in a worthy branch of learning was to be the respected leader in the community. The erudite scholar and not the merchant prince was the commanding figure in Jewish communal life. Among us the cultured man was the scholarly man, and, vice versa, the uncouth man was the ignoramus. There were even those among us who could not conceive of true piety without learning. The first chapter of our literature begins with light, and enlightenment has been our goal ever since.

The Jewish student has a noble lineage among our people. He forms a link in the golden chain whose beginning is traced back to Divinity. Our history may be said to rest first on spirituality and then on scholarship. It is the union of Divinity and humanity as we were able to see it and as we have been able to make the world understand it. By these two powers we have been able to work and live, or rather to live and work. They are the alpha and omega of our history and literature. They are evident everywhere. They have justified for us the singular title of The People of the Book. And well we might prize this titular honor. It gained for us the respect of the world and raised self-respect within us. It made us not only the servants of the Lord in the Biblical sense, but also the torchbearers of knowledge and the servants of civilization as well. Little wonder that one great authority of the Mishna placed the pursuit of knowledge at the head of many virtues.

"I have made thee a watchman unto the house of Israel," says God to the prophet Ezekiel. The same words Israel has always spoken to her students. The prophet was the watchman by virtue of his spirituality and his learning, and the student is the watchman by virtue of his superior position because of superior opportunity. The Jewish student is not only indebted to the faculties that teach him but to his historic ancestry from whom he has inherited the desire to learn. No statistician will ever be able to compute the genealogy of a Jewish student. The entire past of Jewish scholarship forms his historical and intellectual background. It is a heritage that is not at the disposal of many non-Jewish students. When the ancestors of the latter were still savages our fathers had already written a great literature and given to the world the most ethical as well as the most spiritual religion. It is because the Jewish world has given so much to the Jewish student that it asks much in return.

Where learning is as powerful as it is in this country and where the learned are the most privileged of our population, the Jewish student can render a great service to his people. Every day we are realizing more and more the influence of public opinion as it is being moulded and expressed by men who speak with the authority of knowledge. As a people we are still either unknown or misunderstood. Some look upon us as antiquated orientals, others as heartless traders. If a wider experience and closer contact with us brings to light the falsity of preconceived opinions then the discovery is regarded as little more than a redeeming exception. With some of us this is a frequent experience. In America this is one of the great disabilities under which we labor. It is the cause of a great deal of misunderstanding and lies at the bottom of much anti-Jewish feeling. To eradicate this entirely may be impossible. On the one hand there will probably always be some of us who will do and say things that will embarrass us. On the other hand it would be miraculous if in so large a population as America counts there should not be a few who will cling to prejudice and willful misunderstanding.

To dispel error and introduce truth and fact about our people is the big task of the American Jewish student. It is from the fountains of learning and enlightenment that this missionary work will have to come. "I have made thee a watchman unto the house of Israel," is both the plea and command of the American Jew to the Jewish student. American public opinion is formed in the higher schools of learning. The most powerful newspaper has not the potency of a second-rate college either to create or to dispel prejudice. The printed word is feeble when placed alongside of the living word speaking from personal experience. Let the colleges of this country through their faculties and student bodies come to the conclusion that the average Jew is not a narrow, stubborn religionist, much less a heartless, grasping individual, devoid of manners and poor in morals. Let the Jewish student give a high account of himself and he will render an inestimable service to the Jewish citizens of this country.

Not to become a missionary among the students but to become an example of the best that we have produced is the task of the Jewish student. It is doubtful whether any class of students is as closely observed as are our students. This is the lot of our people everywhere. There are those who deplore this constant surveillance. I have never regretted it. To me it has always seemed a blessing in disguise. It has been a healthy check on bad habits and evil propensities. Where it has caused us much harm the fault was not in being observed, but the evil in us which the observation has brought to light and knowledge. The conduct of the Jewish student should therefore be such that close scrutiny would result in admiration and in respect. If our students in the American colleges would but realize that the great part of the thinking and intellectual citizens form their opinion of the Jew from them, they would strain every effort to gain honor for themselves and the people to which they belong.

I am not at present concerned with academic distinction, though I am not unmindful of it. The average Jewish student applies himself diligently to his work. If there is one that does not there are many that do. As a class we make good pupils. We love learning. Few things are rarer than a complaint from faculties that we pay no attention to work placed before us. Our past predisposes us to study. We come from a people for whom to learn has become second nature. But mere learning will not produce the desired results. In some European universities this is even counted against us. Not many years ago the Russian minister of education justified his position in keeping Jewish students away from the Russian universities on the ground that they excelled their fellow-students in scholarship.

But the American Jewish student will perform a noble task if to the work of the mind he will add the fine attributes of the Jewish soul. The world knows well enough the Jewish mind. What it does not know is the Jewish heart. With our intellect it is acquainted, but our spirituality is still the great Unknown to them. It is becoming more and more urgent for the Jewsh student to employ the spiritual forces of our people, the qualities that have made Israel great throughout the ages. One of the strangest phenomena we have to confront today is the charge that the Jewish student is ignorant of the spiritual knowledge that made his forefathers a priest people. We hear on all sides the question, What has become of Jewish knowledge among the Jewish students? Have they made the literatures of the world their aim and omitted their own? Do they know all the classics except the Bible, have they read the world's great dramas but ignored Job, have they pondered over the world's code but overlooked the Mosaic Code, have they reveled in Milton, in Shakespeare, in Browning and Tennyson and lost sight of their own Psalms?

In days past the Jewish student knew the gems of his own cultural development. This made him spiritual as well as intellectual. Maimonides was a great physician and philosopher, but he was also a great Talmudist. Spinoza was the most profound thinker of his age, he was also the profound student of his people's literature. Moses Mendelssohn was a keen philosopher, but he knew the intellectual product of his own people as well as he knew that of the Germans. This wider knowledge made these men great and enabled them to render valuable service to their people. These old masters could give their colleagues a correct impression of the best that was in their people. They were the personification of fine minds and great souls. Being the privileged of Israel they turned their prerogatives to the service of their brothers.

This is what we ask of the Jewish student. He must learn to combine the best his own history has produced with the best the colleges and universities have to offer. He must have the two. It may be sufficient for the non-Jewish student to have learning alone; the Jewish student must have spirituality also. Alongside of every history he studies he must learn his own history, to every literature he must add his own. If adverse criticism of our people comes from the colleges and universities, then the Jewish student is partly to be blamed. His is the opportunity to show in a thousand ways the nobility of Jewish life, the correct interpretation of Jewish history and the ethical and spiritual influence of Judaism.

This means that the Jewish student will have to become the student of things Jewish. Until a few years ago many a Jewish student was flagrantly ignorant of his people's historical achievements. He knew he was a Jew because some of the fraternities said he was not eligible to their membership. With some the knowledge never went much further. But better days came. We began to comprehend that to persist in this ignorance was dangerous to our self-respect. Faculties and students in the large universities began to observe that our boys and girls were the only ones that did not attend divine services in which Judaism brought the message. They began to see that every denomination observed its holidays and that the Jewish student alone ignored the distinction between sacred and secular days. We, the people who had given the greatest and most spiritual interpretation of religion to the world, were the heathens on the campus. We became the subject of comment which did not reflect credit on us. This aroused us to realize the seriousness of the situation. Plans were formed to introduce Judaism to the Jewish student and to free him from the charge brought on himself that he was the non-religious member of the student bodies in the American colleges and universities.

"I have made thee a watchman unto the house of Israel," said God to the prophet Ezekiel, and therefore He had him to do certain tasks. I have selected you as the privileged class among American Israel, is the note which Jewry sounds to the American Jewish student, and therefore demands from him certain duties. There are many things we must do to place our people in the true light before the American people. The task is a big one and will have to be distributed among all classes. Each individual will have a part to do, but the giant share will fall to the student. He alone is constantly in the most powerful and strategic field in America. He is where the best and most powerful public opinion is being moulded. During his years of residence he gives the opportunity to tens of thousands to observe what the Jew is and can be. He must therefore strive to become such a type that those who know him will respect him and esteem more highly his people.

The privileged of all peoples have ever had to defend their brothers. In fact it was the service they rendered to their people that gave them their high rank. The Jewish student will justify his high position and the hope that is placed in him if he will measure up to the dignity of learning and to the high honor that the Jewish learned have always enjoyed. If ancient lineage makes one an aristocrat, then are our students the most ancient of aristocrats. An aristocracy, however, that is based on the past alone is not very strong. The past should never be allowed to be more than a background and impetus. The present must give real dignity and worth. So we hope it will be with our Jewish students. Jewish scholarship of the past will serve as an inspiration to them. Our respect for them shall be based on something they themselves achieve for us and our tribute to them shall stand as the measure of a worthy and lasting service they render to the household of Israel. They are the watchmen of Israel. They are our representatives in the greatest assemblies of the country. Through them we are judged by the most powerful intellects. May their learning, ideals and character reflect credit on them, on Judaism and on the ancient and historic people to which they belong.

PRIZE OFFER.

The Federation of American Zionists offers a prize of $100.00 and a bronze medal for the best original essay on some phase of Jewish life and culture in Palestine, by a student in any college or university in the United States or Canada. The donor of the prize is Mr. Louis Denbitz Brandeis, and the judges are Judge Julian W. Mack of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals, and Prof. Frankforter, of Harvard Law School, and Prof. Richard Gottheil of Columbia University. The contest closes Nov. 1, 1915. All manuscripts and inquiries should be addressed to the Federation of American Zionists, 44 East 23rd street, New York, N. Y.

Palestine, Present and Future

By RABBI MAX J. MERRITT - - - - EVANSVILLE, INDIANA

(Impressions gathered during the writer's travels in Palestine in 1913)

From the time of the Crimean War, the most disturbing question in the world of diplomacy was, who was to be the heir of Turkey in Europe. The Balkan War was the sword that cut that Gordian knot. Turkey in Europe has ceased to be with the exeception of slender foothold that even now is slipping from beneath the desperate Turk. And now that that question has been settled the next in order is, what shall be the fate of the magnificent empire of the Turk in Asia, an empire that sweeps from the Caucasus to the Persian Gulf and from the Metiterranean on the West to beyond the historic waters of the Tigris and Euphrates, an empire but little less in extent than the dominions over which the great conquerors Sennacherib, Nebuchadnezzar and Cyrus ruled in the heyday of their glory? To-day there is no further talk of the rehabilitation of the Turk. No matter what changes the map of Europe may present after the great world-conflict, it is practically certain that the map of Asia will reappear as a collection of satrapies of the great powers.

And to the Jewries of the world, nothing can be of more interest than speculation as to the future of the cradle of the race. What is to be the fate of Palestine? In the kaleidoscopic change of rulers that this storied land has known, what new master stands behind the drawn curtain of the future? I am prepared to say that in Palestine no tears will be shed by any section of the people, Jewish, Christian or Mohammedan, at the demise of the present master. There have been sporadic efforts made by American Jewish journals to enlist sympathy for the Turk and his misfortunes. We have been reminded that it was the Turk who opened the door to the exiled Jew in the closing years of the 15th century and gave him a welcome and a home. The "zachus abos," the virtues of the fathers have been invoked for him, but the truth of the matter is that if ever a people were responsible for its own misfortunes and richly deserved the fate that threatens it, that people is the Turk.

I was fortunate enough to be in Palestine during the Balkan War, and was an eye-witness to the complete and utter breakdown of "constitutional" Turkey by the pressure of that struggle. Palestine is indeed a shining example of Turkish incapacity. It is the eloquent witness of Turkish maladministration. In a hundred ways it calls attention to Turkish corruption, inefficiency and criminal neglect. The Young Turks so much lauded when they assumed the reins, have proven a broken reed. A very clever Jewish woman who has been engaged in educational work in Palestine for twenty years summed up the conditions under the Old Turks and the Young Turks very aptly: "Under the Old Turks," she said, "we paid 'baksheesh' and got some concessions. Under the Young Turks we still pay baksheesh and get nothing." It seems to be the fate of Palestine to know only masters interested in enriching themselves at its expense. Exploitation might be said to be the one all-sufficient word that might be written across the historic record of the land whether under Roman Byzantine, Crusader or Turkish rule.

Palestine to-day offers a classic example of Turkish exploitation, of the policy that takes out everything it can in taxation and gives back as little as it can in governmental blessings. Oppressive taxation has been the cardinal evil of Palestine—an evil as ancient as the prophets. Whether the years be good or bad, the burdens of taxation never lighten. Whether the soil yields bountifully or meagerly, the Turkish tax-gatherer is always there to take the lion's share. The government takes an "osher" (one-tenth) of the produce of the fields, and before the government representative has been satisfied with his "osher" not a measure of grain may be carried from the threshing floor. And I have been told in the Jewish colonies that it is one of the favorite schemes of the government representative to claim far more than an "osher" and to make it impossible to move the grain until he gets his graft. The government has a unique way, profitable to itself, of laying a tax on the fruit trees of the land. It taxes every individual tree. It goes into a man's olive orchard, for example, and counts the number of his trees and assesses the tax accordingly. But when it takes this tax in fruit. as it must from the great majority of the "fellaheen," it takes its tax from the best trees and leaves him the fruit of the poorest. A well-to-do Syrian told me that in front of his home had formerly stood one of those grand old olive trees that one sees so frequently in Palestine—old patriarchs, twisted, boled and gnarled—a tree probably a thousand years old, and valued more for its age, its beauty, and its shade than for the meagre fruit that it produced. He took a pride in it as a kind of family heirloom. It produced fruit to the value of about four dollars a year. Some years ago there was a reassessment of taxes and a tax of five dollars a year was laid upon this tree that produced four dollars' worth of fruit. The owner protested and the protest, being of no avail, he cut down the tree and sold its wood for the manufacture of olive wood ornaments. This example is characteristic of the land. Whenever a tree becomes barren it is chopped down and sold, and a country already sadly denuded of its fruit and shade trees, a country in bitter need of a forest station, becomes progressively more barren and treeless with the passing years. But if the people felt that from that burdensome taxation there was an adequate return in the ordinary utilities and safeguards that organized government is supposed to yield to its tax-payers, there might be the same tolerant and good-natured indulgence for the grafter that we find in America. But it would seem that a most niggardly proportion of this burdensome tax is spent to the advantage of the taxed. In a land that boasts about one hundred and fifty miles of railroad, if we exclude the railroad that runs from Beirut across the Lebanons to Damascus, much depends upon the upkeep of the country roads and prime condition of the bridges, that the peasants may have the proper facilities for transporting their products to market. And for the upkeep of the roads and bridges, a "emjedieh," about eighty-five cents, is paid by every man and women in Palestine. There are good highways connecting the most famous of the sacred sites—the sites dear to the tourist heart—highways running south from Jerusalem to Hebron, east down to Jericho, west over the Judean hills and across the Philistine plain to Joppa and north to Nazareth. But in the rural sections of the land only by the greatest stretch of courtesy can the rocky stretches over which goods are painfully and laboriously transported be called roads. In many places they look as if they had never been touched by spade or pick. On one continuous journey of twenty days, a party of travelers, of which I was a member, camped and rode over these rocky trails called roads. I remember that we had been out but a few days when one of the horses failed to show up as we were about to break camp and when his rider inquired for his beast, the attendant explained in broken English, "Last night he died of the tired." And before the end of the journey several of our beasts had died of the "tired," pushed, as they were, over roads that for wretchedness and primitive roughness are hard to equal. The bridges are even more wretched. I saw only about half a dozen iron bridges in the land. The streams are, in the main, crossed by fords as in the Bible days. And the only bridges that really stir the admiration are the wonderful structures that the Romans threw across the streams 2,000 years ago, which Turkish neglect has permitted to fall into a sadly dilapidated state, although the least possible expenditure would restore them practically and aesthetically.

The field of scientific sanitation is a mystery into which the Turk has not yet penetrated and the hospital needs of the land are largely supplied by Christian and Jewish institutions. And when one considers the prevalence of glaucoma and other eye diseases and the waves of smallpox and other epidemic diseases that sweep over the land, it is difficult to conceive the pitch of misery and wretchedness to which the people of the land would be reduced were it not for the medical service and excellent institutions that pious sentiment of the Jew and Christian have given to the land. From all over the country, the Arabs come in to avail themselves of the benefits and advantages of these excellent institutions. Near Medeba, across the Jordan, I met an Arab who had come from beyond the Hajj road on the edge of the desert, in a burning fever, riding three days to reach the nearest hospital in Jerusalem and driving before him a couple of goats to discharge his hospital bill. To lessen the appalling eye diseases in the land, where at a conservative estimate one in every ten of the population is either blind or defective in vision, the government has taken practically no steps, and whatever has been accomplished has been due to the devoted service of the Jewish and Christian physicians.

Practically nothing has been done to correct the astonishing illiteracy. Abdul Hamid was consistent. He thought schools as dangerous as bombs and under him they did not flourish, while the Young Turks have had too many other problems to distract them to concern themselves with the problem of education. With no stimulus to improve their primitive agricultural implements and methods, with no encouragement to reforest the waste places, the soil has been progressively impoverished and the great rolling limestone hills of Judea have been so denuded of their trees that they look pathetically barren in the glare of the Palestinian sun. Looking over these bleak, bare and monotonous gray heights involuntarily one asks himself what there was in scenes like these that inspired the poets and singers of the Bible to paeans in praise of nature and her bounty. But one forgets that these rolling hills were then terraced from base to summit with gardens and dotted with almond and olive groves and festooned with vineyards even as they could be to-day under a wiser and more benignant and more generous administration. What lowland and seemingly barren hillside can produce is attested by the fertile fields and flourishing olive groves of the Jewish colonists. In fact, the land is redeemed from rural ugliness by the paradises of beauty, fertility, and order that the Jewish colonists have scattered through the land. In these colonies the application of scientific agricultural methods, the use of the latest farming implements and careful afforestation gives a hint of the possibilities that still lie hidden in this woefully neglected and much abused land.

Neither are the ancient and historic monuments of the land too well safeguarded under its present master. These monuments are the common property of the world. In other lands they are looked upon as one of its richest assets. In Egypt and Greece they are guarded with jealous care and have been restored and preserved with loving hands. In Palestine no efforts are made to safeguard them. At ancient Belfort, in northern Galilee, crowning a lofty hill, there stands a noble Crusader castle, one of the most magnificent speciments, even its ruin, of the architectural genius of those Crusader days. We climbed that hill to feast our eyes on its bastions, towers, moats and courtyards and when we came to the ancient chapel, we found a group of peasants pulling down the beautiful pointed Gothic arch that rose above the entrance. Through our guide we asked them why they were breaking down this beautiful structure. They answered that they wanted the cut stones for building material. And that when the limestone hills all about were natural quarries capable of supplying them with an inexhaustible amount of building material. Many of the noblest monuments of the land have thus been defaced beyond the possibility of repair by this kind of vandalism that goes on unchecked by the powers that be.

Jews, Christians, and Moslems are a unit in their detestation of the neglectful, corrupt and criminally indifferent government to which they yield allegiance. The hostility of the Christian element in Palestine is natural. The Jews, had they any real reason for loyalty, could be depended upon to give more than a half-hearted support to the present regime. But the surprising thing I found was that the overwhelming Arab element of the land is hostile to the government. I remember discussing the wretched conditions that obtained in Palestine under the Turkish regime with an ardent young Zionist in Hederah, and I said that it seemed to me that it would be a blessed day when this long-suffering province was organized into a protectorate of one of the great powers. To my surprise, while he agreed that conditions were almost intolerable, he expressed the hope that things might go on as they were, for years, if necessary, until the Zionists were numerous enough and strong enough to make themselves masters of the situation. I for one could not echo his hope. I could not wish that over half a million people should go on living as they did even for the possible benefit of Zionism.

What the land needs above all things today is a stable administration, strong enough and firm enough to hold the balance between the conflicting and antagonistic racial and religious interests, and to establish security and confidence. Whose administration shall that be — Russian, French or English? The menace of Russia looms large in the land. She has large holdings, much property and many monasteries in the land. Millions of Russian Orthodox Christians view the Holy Land with an intensity of fervor out of all proportion to that of any considerable body of Western Christians. Any one who has ever seen the ecstasy of the Russian pilgrims as they march across the land and kneel before the wayside shrines must realize that the Russian masses are prepared to fight for it with a Crusader joy. But the Roman Catholic church would never tolerate the sacred places entirely in the hands of their ancient and bitter rivals of the Greek Orthodox church, and France's influence, gained by a commercial penetration of northern Syria is an effective barrier against Russian hopes. And lastly, there is England, who more than ever since the recent attempt to strike at Egypt across the Sinai desert will have no great rival within such easy striking distance of one of her vital spots. And out of these conflicting interests, these clashing rivalries, these jealousies of the great powers, added to a new consideration for weak peoples struggling for national rebirth, may not the hopes of idealists and enthusiasts yet take substantial form and the dream of Zion as an autonomous buffer state yet be realized?

Religious Freedom

By MR. GEORGE N. BLACK

Los Angeles, Calif.

Despite the benefit of centuries of cumulative culture and enlightenment, the whole continent of Europe today is a charnel house and an open grave. Why?

Why are twenty-five million human beings engaged at this moment in a futile competition of wholesale murder?

What availeth our boasted "civilization" if it can lead us to no better end than this?

When the fighting ceases and the reckoning begins—when the diplomats gather to haggle over terms and to formulate treaties of peace—what then?

When that times comes, it behooves the neutral nations, who have suffered almost as much as have the warring powers from this world calamity, to appear and be heard in favor of just and equitable terms, which shall wisely take notice of previous causes and provocations, to eliminate them henceforth forever; and particularly terms, which shall not contain within themselves the germs of future wars.

What were the fundamental causes of this war? The same causes which have provoked and produced all other wars, since time immemorial, viz.:, the inconceivable folly of one race seeking to conquer and rule another, and the unspeakable profanation of the people of one religion butchering the people of another in the name of Almighty God.

"We may cry peace, but there will be no peace" if the Moslem murders the Christian, and the Christian massacres the Jew; if the Saxon tries to rule the Turk, or the Turk the Greek; the Teuton over the Latin or the Serb; and the Slav over the Pole, the Finn or the Oriental.

Any so-called Peace Treaties which may be written after the war will be just so much waste paper unless the nations involved have the wisdom to recognize the real causes of war and the statesmanship to eliminate them henceforth forever from all human calculation, by substituting in place of religious bigotry, misguided ambition, and national greed a universal spirit of toleration, magnanimity and righteous dealing.

Is this a visionary hope, impossible of realization—"a beautiful but intangible dream?"

Surely not, because our own nation, thank God, has lived and exemplified these very ideals now for nearly a century and a half, to the inestimable blessing of a hundred million people.

Therefore it is quite fitting that our country, which is friendly to all nations and hostile to none, should assume the initiative in organizing the public opinion of the whole world to intervene diplomatically when the peace parleys begin, and to demand of the present warring powers, regardless of who "wins" or "loses," to demand in the name of our common humanity and of our innocent and defenseless posterity, that the terms of peace shall include, primarily, a universal grant of religious freedom, and a universal charter for each race and nation to govern itself for all time, unmolested, within the limitations of its natural geographical bounds.

We need no treaties stipulating the neutrality of countries like Holland and Switzerland, but we do need treaties guaranteeing in perpetuity the neutrality and disarmament of every nation on earth which is now maintaining a colossal army or navy.

There is no actual need for armies or navies anywhere in the world, except a domestic force for police duty and an international fleet, not to wage war but to prevent war—to defend one nation, if necessary, from the aggressions of another.

Then and then only will peace be a real peace, a permanent and abiding peace, and not a mere temporary peace, an illusory and fraudulent peace, which will only lead the coming generation into another, greater, and ghastlier war.

Let the B'nai B'rith arouse the public opinion, the press and the pulpit of our country to realize in this not alone a solemn and impelling duty, but beyond that, an unprecedented opportunity for securing and perpetuating to the God-fearing, peace-loving people of the whole world the priceless benefactions of universal peace—"and the effect thereof shall be righteousness forever."

AN IMPERSONAL CENTENARY

By PROF. GOTTHARD DEUTSCH, Ph. D.

The desire for aristocracy is innate in human nature. This is a sad fact, but it cannot be altered. Had Great Britain been victorious in our war of independence, we would have today, instead of sons and daughters of the revolution, societies of the sons and daughters of loyalists. Rome started as a republic. It did not take very long and the citizens of the republic were divided into two classes, the patricians, the sons of the original settlers, and the plebians, the descendants of the later arrivals. It required centuries of political struggle until the disabilities of the plebians were removed. No sooner had these barriers disappeared, when a new class of aristocrats came to the front, who were called "Optimates," the sons of office holders, and it may be that at one time our ladies of the Congress and the Cabinet will develop into a similar aristocratic organization. The Jews, who from the viewpoint of their neighbors, occupied the lowest rung of the social ladder, had also an aristocracy of their own, and, without desiring to be an apologist of aristocracy, we can at least state with satisfaction, their aristocracy was one of learning. When I was a boy, we had in our town one Itzig Loeb, who was born about 1800. His official name was Morgenstern, but everybody called him Itzig Loeb Taxel (Yiddish for badger), on account of his short legs. Beside he had a surname "Kohol's Raggen," in American slang, "againster," because he was constantly in opposition to the party ruling our Congregation. For me he seemed to have a particularly soft spot. When, as a student, I spent my vacation at home, he once said to me, "Last week I was in Bruenn and people told me a great deal about some who had made a success in business or had risen very high in public life. I told them; to me that means nothing. I will tell you what I consider aristocracy. In our little town there is a young man who is the fifth generation of Talmudic scholars, whom I knew personally." And this was a fact. He had known, as a child, my father's great grandfather, a Dayan of the Congregation, who died in 1803. He had known quite well all the succeeding four generations, including myself. Similarly I remember Dinah, a neighbor of ours, told me one Hoshanah Rabba morning, when father and I were sitting up until after midnight to study Talmud, as is customary: "I heard you 'learn' last night. It seems in your house the walls must already know the Talmud." Such impressions undoubtedly had a great effect on my subsequent development. An illustration on a larger scale of the importance of historic precedent is furnished by the men whose centenary gave me the suggestion to present this thought. Samuel Wolf Schreiber, rabbi of Pressburg, was born March 1, 1815, on the same day with Isaac Hirsch Wise, whose centenary I used for a biographical appreciation in a recent issue of the "Israelite." He had succeeded his father, the real founder of modern orthodoxy, Moses Sofer, who entered his office as rabbi of Pressburg in 1806, and just one hundred years later the great grandson Akiba Schreiber, succeeded his father, Bernhard (Simchah Bunnum), the son of Samuel Wolf. So four generations of the same family have succeeded each other as rabbi in this old historic community. The present rabbi can even look back upon a seventh ancestor, for whom he is named, Akiba Eger, who was rabbi of Pressburg in 1758. The record is in all likelihood unparalleled, and surely had its effect on the development of this remarkable congregation. If a Cincinnatian, visiting Europe, should happen to mention that Lexington, Ky., represents a municipal life entirely different from that of Dayton, Ohio, his interlocutor would ask him, "how far is Lexington from Cincinnati?" He would answer, sixty miles, and would have given the same answer as to the distance to Dayton. European people would consider it impossible that these two places could be so entirely different in their general make-up.

Yet such is the difference between Nikolsburg and Pressburg. Either city is about sixty miles distant from Vienna. Yet their difference in spiritual matters is as great as the difference between Czenstochov and Breslau. Up to about 1840 the matter was entirely different. In those days both cities might have had the same intellectual atmosphere. Up to 1829, when Marcus Benedict, one of the leading Talmudists of his time, was rabbi of Nikolsburg, and Landrabbiner of Moravia, the city had about three hundred young men, who de[illegible] all their time to the study of the [illegible] Under Benedict's successors the [illegible] changed and after 1848 the difference between the two places became marked. The Yeshibah in Nikolsburg was a matter of the past, at the time when Samson Hirsch held the office of Landrabbiner, 1847 to 1851, and no trace of it remained, when I first visited the historic place in 1868. That Pressburg was not affected by the March storm of 1848, was not caused by political conditions, but evidently by the power of a strong personality, as was Moses Sofer. In this way accidents play an important part in history. Moses Sofer was born in Frankfort am Main in 1762. At the age of twenty he accompanied his teacher, Nathan Adler, relative of the late chief rabbi of London, by the same name, when he was called as rabbi to the city of Boskowitz, in Moravia. Nathan Adler, on account of his religious eccentricities, could not hold his position, and returned to his native place, while the young man, whom he had brought along, remained. He subsequently married a widow in Prossnitz, and, as was customary in those days, was expected to prepare himself for a rabbinical career, which he entered in 1795, in Strassnitz, Moravia. Having served afterwards the Congregation of Mattersdorf, he was, in 1806, called as rabbi to the important Congregation of Pressburg, where his fame as a Talmudist attracted a great number of disciples, so that he may be called the father of Hungarian, and altogether of modern orthodoxy. His position is characterized in the brief words, which he coined, as a pun on a Talmudic law, and in punning he was a great master, "Every innovation is prohibited by the Torah." Characteristic for him is also his will, in which he said in a doggerel: "Keep your hands off the books of Moses Mendelssohn." He, further, in his will, clearly stated that none of his successors should ever speak in correct German. Nobody, of course, ever thought before that speaking Yiddish was a religious duty. It was simply a fact. Through Moses Sofer and his school it was promoted to the rank of a religious law. So the German orthodox, beginning with a man like Isaac Bernays, not only disobeyed this injunction, but seemed to have laid a certain stress on the fact that in matters of culture an orthodox Jew could be the equal of a reformer. This latter point marked the difference between the neo-orthodox of Western Europe and the neo-orthodox of the Pressburg school. The latter is best represented by one of Moses Sofer's disciples, Hillel Lichtenstein, who, on the ground of the Biblical statement, that the Egyptians loathed the children of Israel, declared that it is the duty of a Jew to so dress, to so speak, and to so act that he shall be despised by his neighbor. This caricature of religious ideas is the most typical fruit of Moses Sofer's theology. Another principle of his which denounces all innovation is his strong opposition to such small alterations from the practice of the synagogue as the removal of the Almemor from the center of the synagogue to the front, or the holding of weddings in the synagogue instead of in the open air, as was customary in former times. Of the latter point Moses Sofer says expressly that those whose weddings are so celebrated will have no share in the blessings of Abraham. A presentation of his theology, which happens to be quite timely, is his decision in the case of a trouble between the Hazan of Deutsch-Kreuz and his Congregation. This Hazan was accused of having performed an act of Shehitah improperly, of having used a knife which was not kosher to cut butter, and having expressed himself indifferently as to the duty of wearing the Arba Kanfos, and of having spoken sarcastically of Naomi as a matchmaker. Some of these counts Moses Sofer dismisses as gossip of no consequence, while in regard to others he is naturally very critical. But inasmuch as there were no witnesses who could clearly testify as to the facts, and the matter rested mostly on hearsay, he dismisses the case. He adds, however, that the whole trouble originated because the Congregation had no rabbi, and therefore admonishes it to see to it that at an early date the vacancy in the rabbinate shall be filled. At the same time he adds a warning, that the Congregations do not elect one of these modern men who read books in other languages than Hebrew, and write for newspapers, but they shall elect a rabbi of the old type, a real Talmudist, and a rigorously observant Jew. The Hazan, who is mentioned as Simchah Reuben, was the father of the famous composer, Karl Goldmarck, recently deceased, and also of Dr. Joseph Goldmarck, member of the first Austrian Reichsrat, and father-in-law of Felix Adler. Another interesting incident is that this decision is addressed to a man by the name of Dukes, who in all likelihood was the father of the famous Austrian statesman and Hungarian poet, Ludwig Doszi. In his will, in which Moses Sofer denounces all innovations as the reading of Mendelssohn's Pentateuch, the preaching in correct German, the going to theater, and the like, he also urges his Congregation to fill the vacancy in the rabbinate soon after his death, and, without directly saying so, recommends his own son, Samuel Wolf, as his successor. The Congregation acted strictly upon the suggestion, and while Samuel Wolf was then only twenty-four years old, he was elected as rabbi of the important Congregation.

Samuel Wolf Schreiber, was the son of his father. He felt this fact both as a privilege and as a duty. It was for this reason that he insisted on the conduct of his Yeshibah as well as on that of his Congregation in exactly the same sense in which his father had fulfilled the duties of his office. Like his father, he would not allow a student of his Yeshibah to study any secular literature, including the much decried Pentateuch translation by Moses Mendelssohn. One of his students once told me the story that the rabbi having caught one of the students, otherwise a promising, studious and strictly pious young man, as studying secular literature. He mildly rebuked him in the class, "Why," said he, "If I knew a store where one could buy a few pounds of 'Taitsch,' I would buy it myself, but to waste time on it, when all our time is to be devoted to the study of rabbinic literature, this is an unpardonable sin." By secular education all modern social customs were under strict ban. An anecdote, for whose authenticity I cannot vouch, tells the following story: the rabbi was informed that one of his students kept company with a young lady. He called him into his presence and rebuked him. The young man answered, "It is true, rabbi, I was seen in company with a young lady, but she was my sister." The rabbi, highly elated, that such a terrible charge against one of his students had no basis, called the accusers into his presence and rebuked them for acting contrary to the rabbinical law which demands that we shall always think well of our neighbors. These students replied, "rabbi, it isn't true, we know his sister, and we know the young lady. She was not his sister." The rabbi called the sinner a second time into his presence and told him what he had heard. The young man said. with a smile, "Rabbi, this time it is true, I have to admit that the young lady is not my sister, but I can assure you, and I can swear a holy oath that I think of her a great deal more than I think of all my sisters."

For looking after the spiritual and material welfare of the Yeshibah, Rabbi Samuel Wolf had a Bachur, by the name of Loeb Gross, engaged. Woe to the unfortunate young man who was seen in a theater. He was deprived of his stipend and threatened with expulsion if the offense should be repeated. It is needless to say that the strict adherence to the traditions of Moses Sofer was absolute law in all questions of synagogue ritual. The placing of the Almemor in the center of the synagogue and the celebration of weddings outside of the synagogue was an absolute law, as sacred as the Ten Commandments. Quite amusing was the interpretation of these practises, under conditions far more difficult than those of the Pressburg "Judengasse." In Vienna, a branch of the Pressburg Congregation was established. It was under the spiritual leadership of Solomon Spitzer, son-in-law of Moses Sofer. As there it was obviously impossible to hold a wedding in the open air, some device had to be invented which would harmonize the law with existing conditions. Over the center of the synagogue a skylight was placed which could be opened, and this was regularly done at the time of a wedding. It actually happened—and I am telling a real fact—that a couple from Hungary was to be married in this synagogue, and the father of the bridegroom first inspected the place to find out whether everything was according to Hungarian traditions. He looked also at the skylight and found out that the opening did not extend over the whole "Chuppah,' and the wedding had to be held in some Hungarian village, not far from Vienna. The principle of decorum in the service was one which was especially antagonized by the Pressburg school. On absolute historic tradition the following interpretation of Samuel Wolf Schreiber rests. He says Scripture tells us: "Keep peace and pursue it." I have a different intrepretation. Our opponents constantly claim that the most imperative duty of the Jews is to maintain harmony in the Congregation and therefore we have to tolerate the infidels as long as they remain in the fold of the Congregation. By such tolerance we merely compromise our principles, and, therefore the Psalmist properly said: "Keep peace and pursue him," which means, pursue the man who always clamors for peace above every other requirement of congregational life." Samuel Wolf Schreiber had the humorous experience that even he was called an innovator. In 1863 a new synagogue was built in Pressburg, and certainly in every respect its architecture followed traditional lines. To the surprise of some orthodox people it was found, after the synagogue was finished that it posseesed a dome, and some zealots claimed that a dome over a synagogue is a non-Jewish practice, inasmuch as Christian churches have domes. The poor rabbi merely could say that never in his life had he looked at a church long enough to know how its architecture was modeled.

It is exceedingly difficult to give a clear presentation of rabbinical views in the case of one individual. The main principle of rabbinic theology is that of casuistry, and there is very rarely enough of a difference between various interpreters of the principle to present it to outsiders in a manner which would make the subject of the sketch an individual type. A few specimens from Samuel Wolf's works shall, however, be given as a weak attempt to show his own kind of theology and his own standing within this kind. Ever since the Middle Ages it became a sort of professional duty that a rabbi publish the decisions that he rendered on important questions of law and religious ethics. Such collections, called Teshubot or Responsa, we possess in very large numbers, and naturally they increased after the printing press had been invented, and it became the moral duty of a family to perpetuate the memory of their celebrated ancestor by the publication of some of his works. By far the most important contribution to the history of Judaism in its orthodox presentation, as antagonistic to all attempts at a change, are the works of Moses Sofer, called from a Talmudic quotation, (Gittin, 66, b), "Hatam Sofer." The son called his works also after a Talmudic quotation, found in the same place, "Ketab Sofer," the former meaning the seal of the scribe, and the latter the writing of the scribe. It seems that the general condition of the time led to a decline in rabbinic casuistry, although it is also a fact that Samuel Wolf was by no means the equal of his father in learning and in intellectual force. Many of the questions treated in his book, are strictly academic and present an opportunity either sought for years to show a man's learning, or to put it more mildly, a welcome opportunity to study a question. Such is undoubtedly the discussion on the very important question whether an idiot, a deafmute, or a minor may write Tefillin. The question was suggested by a similar dessertation coming from the time of decadence of rabbinic literature. Joseph Teonim Fraenkel, rabbi of Frankfort an der Oder (died 1793), member of a very prominent rabbinical family, discusses in his work, "Peri Megadim," which is the most typical representative of decadent casuistry, the question whether a one-armed man, who, according to the law, is exempted from laying the Tefillin on his other arm, may write Tefillin, for though, having been born with one arm, he never had the duty of laying Tefillin, and, according to the general principle, affecting one who is not under the obligation of fulfilling a law, cannot help others to fulfill it, this case is one exception. Therefore, the man who addresses the question to Samuel Wolf Schreiber asks why should not a deafmute, an idiot, or a minor, all of whom are exempt from fulfilling the obligation of the law be privileged to write Tefillin and help others fulfill the law from which they are exempt. None will care to follow the whole line of dialectical arguments by which Samuel Wolf Schreiber establishes a difference between a man who never was under the obligation of the law, but was prevented from fulfilling it by external circumstances, and between one who is exempt because he is not capable of fulfilling the law. The whole discussion is typical, however, for the remarkable conception of what theology means. Another more practical case, which has its importance because it is followed by a modern question, is this: A physician who was a Cohen was appointed coroner. According to the law, he, as a descendant of Aaron, becomes defiled, when coming in contact with a corpse. The rabbi, therefore, would not allow the physician to be called to the Torah as the first, or to pronounce the benediction on holy days, which are the privileges of a Cohen. The doctor either was an observant Jew, or his family was indignant at the rabbi's act in withdrawing from one of its members the privileges supposed to be inherited for over 3,000 years. The rabbi, hard pressed by the influential family, submitted the case to the rabbi of Pressburg, and the latter decided that the action of the rabbi was perfectly correct, and as long as the physician would not promise to resign from his office and to refrain in future from an infringement on this saccerdotal dignity, he should not be accorded the privileges of a Cohen.

The Reform of Judaism—Old and New

By REV. N. MOSESSOHN, D.D., LL.B.,

Editor, The Jewish Tribune : : Portland, Oregon

The Jewish Bible has laid down laws for the Jews' conduct. These laws were not only suitable to an agricultural people as our ancestors were, but answered the demands of their time generally, hence many laws have their simile in the laws of other contemporary nations. It is not at all surprising that some of the Hammurabi laws are similar to the Mosaic. It is not because Moses appropriated them from the Hammurabi code, but because the necessities of the Jews in Moses' time were of the same nature as of the people of the Biblical Amraphel in his tim. Hence Moses framed laws that suited well a people of agriculturists and shepherds, and agreed with the spirit of their time as also with customs of the surrounding nations.

As time progressed and ethics advanced, some of these laws became obsolete: they outlived their usefulness and practicability and a change was necessary. The question arose how to make the change. Should the old laws be discarded? Should a rule be accepted that Biblical laws are not binding and one may change them at will? Though such a process would satisfy the immediate demands, yet it would destroy the authority of the Bible and with it the fundamental strength of Judaism. Once the Bible is declared not binding—not God's word, the strongest link that united Israel must necessarily be demolished, and yet, a change must be made. The people cannot be guided by laws that have outlived their usefulness.

The question took on another phase. It formulated itself into whether it were not better to retain the old laws in spite of justice, a policy that cannot but cause a break in Israel's unity, or to declare those laws not binding and destroy the strongest element of Israel's unity. The question became a vital one. Its solution became a most difficult task. Utmost tactfulness, sublimest consideration, great statesmanship and strictest care were necessary for the solution of this vital question.

Though we have no data regarding the activity on this question by leaders in Israel who preceded the Talmudical Rabbis, yet the mere fact that they succeeded in keeping Israel as a unit proves that they found some solution that worked well for a time.

But, again time progressed and radical changes became more and more imperative. Our Rabbis taking this task upon their shoulders bethought a plan by which the unsuitable laws may be changed and yet the authority of the Bible retained. They conceived the idea to make such changes not as contradiction to the Bible, but as a compliance with it. They laid down the rule: Hafoch boh v'hafoch boh d'chuloh voh—"Ponder and ponder again on the law since it includes everything" (Aboth chap. V, Mishnah 25), also ayein ponim batorah—"the law carries seventy various interpretations" (Bamidbar Rabbah, Chap. 14). By this means they preserved the holiness of the Bible—a holiness in which every Jew believed. New laws were also instituted, based upon the interpretation of the Bible itself.

Having the Bible as their support they succeeded in making their new laws as binding upon the people as the laws of the Bible itself. Chachomim osu chizuck l'divreihem k'shel torah—"The wise men made their words (laws) of such a binding power as the words of the Torah" (Baba Metzia 55a), and Chachomim osu chisuck l'divre hem yother mishel Torah—"The wise men made their words even more binding than the words of the Torah" (Kithuboth 83b). This means that the people not only accepted these laws no less than the laws of the Torah itself, but considered them as a strengthening of the Torah; they understood them to be the only means for the correct interpretation of the Torah. This was a logical consequence. In fact were not these laws based upon God's word—the Bible? Did they not take their originality from the correct understanding of the Word of God as read in the Holy Bible? Hence, the ready willingness of the people to abide by such interpretations and considering them not a whit less authoritative than the ordinances and commandments of the Bible.

The Rabbis were reformers: they reformed the law, instituted new customs, changed the old laws radically, but won the people because they did not destroy the Bible but strengthened it. The student of the Talmud cannot but find that every Rabbinic law has some support from the Bible. The ingenuity of our Rabbis in interpreting the Bible in such a manner that it should answer the spirit of the time gained the admiration of the scholars—Jews and non-Jews alike.

A few examples of such interpretations will suffice to show their inventive power. Knowing that progress does not stop, they did not make their laws of an everlastingly binding nature. Even for the time being they made their laws conditioned by:

a) The person—certain persons were exempt from certain laws; to such belonged: men of higher station (Berachoth 19a), the nervous (Idem b);

b) Environment—where the laws cannot be practiced because it would diminish the honoring of kings (Idem 19b).

c) Majority of Individuals—where the law changes for the convenience of the majority (Sabbath 38b).

d) Necessity—as to earning a living, and we read that Rabbi Yehudah Ha-nasi permitted many persons to do many things which were formerly prohibited. (Yerushalmi Taanith, Chap. 1, Sect. 1; Dmai, Chapter 2; Shviis, end of chapter 6; Baba Bathra 90b, Yoma 83b, Psachim 90a and many more).

A law may be changed where there is an urgent necessity to do so, "because one is anxious over his dead and if thou wilt not permit him . . . he will do it himself" (Shabbath 43b). They laid down the rule "The Torah was not intended for angels" (Berachoth 25b), meaning that the law cannot require of man that which he, by his nature, cannot do. They went so far in their reform that they did not hesitate to describe their laws by "What they (the previous Rabbis) have permitted thee they made thee a present from thine own" (Eruvin 104b). The communal good was made supreme and the laws were interpreted accordingly.

Notwithstanding the Biblical "Ye shall kindle no fire on the Sabbath day" (Exodus XXXV:3), and "Ye shall keep the Sabbath therefore for it is holy unto you; everyone that defileth it shall surely be put to death . . . " (Idem XXXI:14). Rabbi Manna permitted the Jewish bakers to sell their bread on the Sabbath day (Yerushalmi Sanhedris, Chap. 3, Sect. 5). Notwithstanding the Biblical prohibition of handling any leaven on Passover (Exodus XIII:7) the Rabbis permitted the Jewish bakers to bake leavened bread on Passover (Yerushalmo Sanhedrin, Chap. 3, Sect. 6). One of these Rabbis said: "Many things that were previously prohibited were permitted at a later time because of necessity (Yebamoth 35a, Kethuboth 15a, Gitin 64a). And all such changes of law were supported by the very Bible whose laws were changed.

"When they prohibited it they supported their opinion with Biblical verse, and when they allowed it they supported their opinion with Biblical verse" Yerushalmi Shviis, Chap. 1, Sect. 1). They went even so far as to pass a law not to interfere when the breaking of Biblical law became a common usage (Betzah 30a), and this law was also supported by Biblical authority.

It was not the Temple, nor the sacrifices that united the Jews. It was the Bible that united Israel. This is proven by the fact that while during the time of the existence of the Temple we hear of many Jews that practiced idolatry, after its destruction, when the Talmudical Rabbis took up the interpretation of the Bible—when they became the teachers of Israel—we very seldom hear of idolatrous Jews. In a word those Rabbis knew what they were about; they knew that the smallest slight upon the Bible could not but cause rupture in Israel which must lead to his destruction. And the good fruit their teachings bore is sufficiently proven by the striking fact that Israel has preserved his identity to our own time — all persecutions notwithstanding. These were the old reformers—these were their means for the preservation of Israel.

Not so our new reformers. While destroying the Rabbinical authority they also demolish the holiness of the Torah. Each Rabbi is a Moses unto himself. They do not look after the common weal of Israel—for the preservation of unity in Israel. This is not their task. Their aim is to cater to the individual; to make the individual's desire to break all laws and customs of Israel possible, and even lawful. If one wishes to marry out of the Jewish fold—an act which undermines the very existence of Israel, as very seldom the issue of such a mixture are Jews—some Rabbis by their supposed liberality, softheartedness and romantic propensity do not hesitate to perform the ceremony, and at best take an obligation from the non-Jewish party that the children that will come from this wedlock will be raised in the Jewish religion, an obligation seldom kept, and of the frequent breaking of which the Rabbi is well aware. Such an act cannot but prove that these Rabbis prefer the immediate inclination or desire of the individual to the weal of the whole Israelitish people.

In Volume XXIV of the Year Book of the Central Conference of America Rabbis, under the heading of "Forbidden Marriages" (pp. 153-154), to a question whether a Rabbi may perform the marriage ceremony where one married in court the half-sister of his mother, both having one father, Dr. Kohler answered by wire, "Certainly, see Lev. XVIII:13 and XX:19." And he continues in his report to say: "There marriage with an aunt, whether on the father's or the mother's side, is prohibited as incestuous. Now, the very fact that this question could be asked by a number of this Conference, who knows his Bible well, indicates a prevailing view that the law of the land is the determining factor as to the legality of the marriage also for us Jews. . . . The fact has come to my notice that a member of this conference not long ago performed the marriage ceremony of a Levirate, directly prohibited as incestuous in the Mosaic law, viz.: where the brother's widow had a child from her deceased husband," and he recommends "a thorough treatment by the Conference of this question," viz.: "how far the marriage laws of the state may be regarded as determining factors for the Jew, and how far they cannot legalize the marriage from a Jewish viewpoint, the same involving the legitimacy of the issue."

What we learn is:

(1) The Doctor's permission of the marriage of one's aunt "the Mosaic law notwithstanding," proves the discarding of the Mosaic law.

(2) That the Doctor is quite satisfied with the fact that "The law of the state is the determining factor as to the legality of the marriage also for us Jews." And we ask if the legality of marriage is to be decided according to the laws of the state "the Mosaic view to the contrary notwithstanding," why a "thorough treatment" of the question of marriages for the purpose of finding "How far they (the Rabbis) can legalize the marriage from a Jewish standpoint?" What viewpoint can be Jewish if it is an accepted rule that for the convenience of the individual the Rabbi may decide at his heart's wish "the Mosaic view to the contrary notwithstanding?" Have we some other authorities for the Jewish viewpoint besides the Mosaic law?

Again the Doctor seems to be satisfied with the indication that "the law of the land is the determining factor as to the legality of the marriage also for us Jews," and yet when the Chairman of the Committee on Civil and Religious Marriage Laws, Dr. Silverman brought in his report in which he insisted that the acceptance of the civil decree of divorce "comports with the Jewish principle dina di malchutha dina—"the law of the land is supreme" (p. 122), the Doctor protested against the application of that Jewish principle in cases of religious or ritual laws (p. 124). We must here remark parenthetically that neither Dr. Silverman nor Dr. Kohler quoted that Talmudical saying correctly: it is dino d'malchutho Dino—(Baba Bathra 54a and other places).

Leaving out the Mosaic law as an authority one questions where will the Rabbis get the Jewish viewpoint? Another thing, will their conclusions be accepted by all reformed Jews the world over? Suppose German or English Reformed Judaism take another Jewish viewpoint? Does not such a policy break the unity of Israel instead of uniting it? Is the interest of an individual worth the disturbing of Israel's unity?

It is as I have said: The olden time reformers had the weal of all the Jews at heart, hence their reformation of Judaism was based upon that authority which all Israel accepted. The present reformers prefer the pleasure and convenience of the individual to the weal of all Israel, hence every Rabbi becomes a Moses not only in the law-making capacity, but also in the breaking of all commandments as Moses did.

I am not opposed to the right kind of constructive reform, but I am strongly opposed to some reformers. I am opposed to the baseless interpretation of Judaism. I am opposed to the demolishing of the Israelitish unity. I am opposed to the destruction of the authority that is nearest and dearest to the Jewish heart—the Bible, especially when such an impractical policy is unwarranted. I am opposed to the activity of some of the reformers in raising the children of their members in ignorance of the Jewish Bible in its original. I see in such reform of Judaism the Christian fulfillment of the Prophets and law which in fact is a destruction of both.

BEN ALTHEIMER.

Mr. Ben Altheimer, of St. Louis, celebrated his sixty-fifth birthday on March 6, 1915. Mr. Altheimer's life has been one of blessed activity and usefulness.

We extend our good wishes to him and hope that he will be granted a long lease of life and the full enjoyment of all the honors that he so well deserves.

The Outlook in District No. 1

By MR. CHARLES HARTMAN
New York City

District No. 1 is coming to the front again, and will keep on marching until the front rank—the position which the "Mother District" should occupy—is reached.

I know that this sounds like a very extravagant statement, but, in spite of this, it is the statement I want to make, because it is the truth. My experience in our beloved Order covers a long enough period for me to be able to estimate the situation at its true value. It is a great source of satisfaction to me to know that finally, we are making that progress which the purposes and the deeds of the I. O. B. B.—its service to the Jewish cause—justly entitle it to make. I am confident that the near future—the next quinquennial—will prove that I have been no false prophet.

District No. 1 has certainly had a hard time of it for quite a long period. Notwithstanding the best efforts of its officers—and almost without exception they have been loyal and energetic—we were practically at a stand still, making but little progress. This may seem strange to many who imagine that because District No. 1 includes the greatest Jewish center in the world, that it ought to have the greatest membership; that it ought to be able to initiate thousands of new members year in and year out. But it's just because we have New York's Jewry to deal with that we have the greatest difficulty. The physical difficulties and the psychological difficulties are almost fatal. A hundred different movements—political, economic, religious, fraternal—contend for supremacy. The people are yelled at from a thousand platforms; propagandists by voice and pen, din their different panaceas and pretentions into their ears day in and day out. Demagogues rant and catch-penny organizations appeal. In the midst of all this clamor, the dignified attitude of the B'nai B'rith, plus the "respectable" membership dues, worked against it. And it is hardly different even now, while I am predicting a splendid future for District No. 1. We shall not fail to make every effort to win out in New York City, but it is in that part of District No. 1 that is outside of this Bedlam of ours that we are making and will make our greatest progress.

Outside of New York City, and notably in New England (although the rest of the district does not lag behind), the Jewish population has become more settled; the Jews have had a chance to find themselves; to make their position secure. They have progressed to that point where they furnish material for the B'nai B'rith.

Under the Presidency of Joseph H. Ullman, the policy of winning the "province" was inaugurated. It was pursued most vigorously. The President, the General Committee and the District Deputies worked along this line incessantly and successfully. How successfully is shown by the fine list of new lodges, organized within the past three years, with membership recruited from the so-called Russian Jews and their sons. These lodges have come to stay—and to work. Each one is a center of propaganda, because its membership appreciates what B'nai B'rith means to it and to our co-religionists at large.

A splendid foundation for the future was thus laid. Now we have an added advantage. With the election of Brother Herman Asher as President the era of young blood has been ushered in. Our younger men appreciate the compliment that has been paid them, and however loyally they have worked in the past, they will work ten times harder now. They feel that we are moving forward, and that feeling gives them new enthusiasm, increased determination, increased vigor. The hardest work has been done—we have struck our stride, and we will go forward until the Mother District is also the Banner District of our beloved Order.

RUSSIA GRANTS MUNICIPAL SELF-GOVERNMENT TO CITIES OF POLAND.

The following has been reported by the Associated Press:

"An earnest of the promised emancipation of Poland is to be found in the law just promulgated granting local municipal self-government to all towns in Poland. Of equal interest with the law itself is the care shown in its provisions to give a fair measure of representation to the Jewish population.

"For the first time under the new law Polish committees enjoy a measure of self-government equal to that enjoyed by Russian incorporated town and districts.

"All correspondence with state departments as also with public bodies or private persons outside Poland and replies to letters addressed to municipal authorities in Russia must be in Russian. Municipal placards and public notices must be in both languages in parallel columns.

THE CONSTITUTION GRAND LODGE CONVENTION.

On the second day of May the Constitution convention of the B'nai B'rith will meet at San Francisco. No convention, since the organization of the Order, has met under the grave and serious conditions which now enmesh the largest part of the Jewry of the world. Fully nine-tenths of the Jewish people of the world are affected by the present bloody conflict of the war. The final effect of this titanic struggle for the mastery of Europe, as far as the Jew is concerned, is in the domain of pure speculation. These conditions, by themselves, bespeak the serious problems which will face this convention, representing an international organization. It is needless to say, that every delegate to this convention has weighed his responsibility. Petty differences, personal ambitions, self-aggrandizement have no place. It will be a convocation of earnest minded men in an earnest cause. This is the day of the men who will work and who are equipped for the work with mind, heart and soul. No matter what the ambition of the individual may have been, to acquire position and honor within the ranks of this Order, unless he is willing to give to this cause the required energy and is equipped with mind, heart and soul, commensurate with the work undertaken, he must step aside and give way to one willing and fitted for the same.

The duties, responsibilities and opportunity of this convention are unequaled in all the past of this Order. This is the only organization, international in its scope, whose units and membership are of every shade of Jewish thought and faith. We meet in a neutral country. It is safe to say that nothing will transpire which would offend, in the least degree, the principles of strict neutrality. Every action taken, which will look to the safeguarding of the Jew, that will insure to him hereafter the inalienable rights of liberty and will guarantee to him the right to worship in the faith of his fathers, should meet with the approval of all who have entrusted to their care the interests of human-kind.

After war we will have peace. When peace is made, then and there the respective powers will decide the destiny of more than half of the Jewish body. It may be that in the peace contracts vast portions of the Jewish people who now enjoy citizenship and equal rights, under the law, will be transferred to a sovereign power which will regard them as vassals and tolerate their liberty, but will not guarantee their rights. It has been stated that when statesmen of Europe speak of humanity they forget the Jew and when they speak of the Jew they forget humanity.

Can the voice and influence of the united Jewry of the world be of service at these momentous times to the Jew and procure for him the guarantee of the inalienable rights which we, as citizens, enjoy in this land? Can the united Jewry of the world arouse the world conscience for the protection of the orphan children among the nations? Can united Jewry appeal to the high tribunals of civilization and humanity for those who are still fettered with the rust-crusted chains of intolerance? We can, if we put into this effort the might and heart of united Jewry of the world. These high purposes can only be accomplished by well directed and united efforts.

In view of this gigantic work, the Order should be strengthened to the very utmost and should now make special effort to bring within its number every Jew of character and standing. The membership should be so strengthened that its power and influence could not be gainsaid.

At no time in the present generation has such opportunity been afforded for the enlistment in the cause of Jewry every Jew fitted to sit in the council of his people. Preparatory to the work to be done within the next year, it is of prime importance that the convention will create extraordinary plans and methods of bringing within the roster of the Order every Jew measuring up to the requirements demanded.

Ample provision should be made for the relief of the victims of war, irrespective of nationality. Quick and immediate first relief has already been given by the executive committee, but this relief is insignificant compared to requirements of the future. The philanthropic institutions of Europe and Palestine which have been maintained heretofore by European Jewry must temporarily, to a large extent, be now maintained by American Jewry. The handling of the more delicate problems affecting the Jew must of necessity be entrusted to capable representatives, men of experience and ability who are willing to undertake this cause. It may be advisable to this end to have an extraordinary committee, or it may be left in the hands of the executive committee. If the latter plan is adopted the importance of selecting the executive committee is self-evident.

The demands of American Jewry will be next in importance. The action of the executive committee in sponsoring the Anti-Defamation League will unquestionably receive unanimous approval. The efficient work done by this League in the short time, a little more than one year, since its formation, should be an object lesson to American Jewry. This League has demonstrated, above all, the advantage of thorough scientific and efficient organization. For many years efforts have been made by some organizations and by many volunteers to stop certain forms of defamation. While these efforts may have been temporarily successful here and there, there was no permanency and no appreciable improvement. The efficiency of the League was demonstrated when permanent results were achieved in the same matters in which other organizations had labored for years in vain. The success of one and the failure of the other was not because of more earnestness, or of greater ability, or of more sincerity, but the success achieved was because of the efficient organization of the one and the lack of the same by others. The League has planned larger work for the future. Its constructive program for the future will require much larger expenditures. Whatever the cost, it is worth the price. The Jew has been defamed so long, he has been misrepresented in the literature of the past so persistently that it will require endless energy to counteract these influences. The pioneer work has been done. It cannot be said that our labors in this field are futile. No educational work can be futile. The trial work of one year in these fields has demonstrated that the subject can be mastered.

A full and free opportunity should be given to the League. It ought to have the support of the entire Order and the efforts should in no manner be embarrassed by lack of funds.

Social service work which has been undertaken by many of the lodges should receive the hearty approval of the convention. The work in these lines is unlimited and while there are other Jewish organizations which have undertaken this work in some degree, it has, however, lacked system and energy.

It may be questionable whether the endeavors along these lines should be undertaken by the Order at large or whether it would not be advisable to entrust this to the district grand lodges. Every section of the country has its individual problems along these lines. The districts which include the metropolitan cities have the burden of this work. Would it not be advisable to entrust this particular line of endeavor to the district grand lodges to meet conditions as they are in each of the respective communities?

In all questions of reform that may demand the attention of the convention, it is of prime importance that only such reforms be undertaken which are practical. The success in business and in state-craft lies in the power to distinguish the practical from the visionary. In undertaking reforms, the success of institutions like ours must be guided by the same principles. While we are engaged in altruistic work, our efforts should be concentrated in those endeavors which are practical and from which results may be achieved.

The keynote of the convention should be greater organized efficiency so that the practical altruistic endeavors for the betterment of the Jewry of the world may be accomplished. This convention should be one of deeds and not mere resolves, of actual work and not mere recommendations, of conditions bettered and not mere promises.

Success to the full in all these high purposes is the wish and hope of every true Jew.

FREEDOM AND LAW.

These intervening weeks bordered at both ends by a season of festivity partake in traditional Judaism of a lugubrious aspect. Whether the abstinences enjoined are really dictated by the memories of the last war of liberation and the martyrdom of Akiba and his disciples may be left an open question. The spring months are naturally a transition period. The chilly winds of April are still on us reminding us that the winter is over in name only. The warmth of the summer is still largely ahead of us. Spiritually likewise we are still dominated by the sentiments which the season of freedom has enkindled in our bosom. That freedom, however, is incomplete without the reign of law, the festival which comes at the end of these weeks rounding off the festivals of our calendar year serves to act as a reminder.

All mankind loves freedom. All nations fight that they may not be enslaved. Individuals likewise shake off the thralldom of their native lands and transfer themselves to more benign countries where they may be free men. The sudden change is frought with danger. The new light of freedom dazzles. With their old habits of slaves men divest themselves of all respect for authority as soon as the grip of the tyrant is loosened. Accustomed as they are to the voice of the taskmaster, they ween themselves at liberty to follow their own inclinations and freedom becomes licentiousness. "It is a free country and I can do as I please." Yes, it is a free country, but freedom with us means obedience to law and order. Our laws are of our own making. We are slaves to none because we are our own masters. But there are laws which are not men-made, but God-given. The eternal verities flashed forth from the Mount are binding upon the freest citizen of the freest republic. No society can be established without them.

Yes, to that extent we are still old-fashioned in that we know ourselves held in leash by the commandments uttered thousands of years ago. There are false philosophies abroad and misleading systems of thought. The laboring man may consider himself exploited by the rich and conscienceless capitalist. We hold no brief for the misdeeds of rich employers and corrupt legislators. But what is worse than spiritual exploitation? You may be robbed of your reason quite as much as of your earnings. Your mind may be poisoned by class hatred. You will be told that it is right to take the law into your own hands, and you know it is not. You will be told that you have grievances and rights but none will enlighten you on your duties. Much will be said about the liberties that are wrested from you, but will they also tell you that a reign of terror and coercion is a menace to freemen?

Complete freedom is an impossible thing. Once you realize that the man against whom you elbow in the street has as much right to freedom as yourself you will understand that liberty without restraint of some sort is tyranny; nay, it destroys itself. In a measure we pay for freedom by slavery or if you please service of one kind or another. If we wish leisure we must earn it by hours spent in labor. If we wish a home in which we can develop our individuality we must be willing to leave it for a portion of the day to obtain a competency. There is no way in this world to get something for nothing. There are occupations that are irksome, duties that are not to our liking. The fewest of us are born into fortunes. In the ordinary run of things, we must earn them ourselves. And while we are earning we are necessarily giving service to others. For the time being we are servants. Of course, service is one thing and slavery another. But those that are most responsible are the least free. The shiftless may throw up their job lightly; the responsible people cannot do so. Many a slight, many an insult is borne submissively for the sake of peace. A sort of give and take is the rule of the world. Freedom without service is an impossibility.

And freedom is impossible without the reign of law. The yoke of the law may be irksome at times, but without it we would be worse off. Judaism prided itself upon the multitudinous laws and commandments which our religion imposes upon us. In the long run, the yoke of the law means the recognition that society is greater than any individual. Imposed from without, the law may be a yoke. Self-imposed it is the privilege of freemen. Judaism has always emphasized the social duties. The individual must know that he is a member of a social aggregate. The other religions that scoff at our legalism forget that were it not for the division of church and state the same conditions would obtain with them. They forget the bulky law codes and the grave exponents of them. Judaism knows that while church and state may be divided, religion and society cannot be separated. And Judaism above all insists on liberty of conscience. Religion is the measure of our supreme freedom, but it is a freedom tempered by obedience to law. "We will do, and obey," said our fathers at the foot of Mount Sinai. "We will do, and obey," say all freemen who are imbued with the idea of service, who are inured to the conviction that the law-abiding citizen is the freest of the free.

WHITEWASHING HOLY RUSSIA.

A French writer has undertaken the unenviable task of proving to the world the benignity of the Czar and the humanity of the Cossack. Alas, he exclaims, both are thwarted by the bureaucracy which he makes out to be a body of mischief-makers recruited from the Junkers of the Baltic provinces and under the sway of Prussia. The distinction he draws between the people and its rulers may have an element of truth in it. Every where the broad masses are peaceful because they lack the initiative. And the Russian peasant may be still more inert than his brother elsewhere. But he is rather to be likened to a sleeping tiger. Once aroused, he displays the brutal and bestial instincts all too well. How

The History and Accomplishments OF THE NATIONAL JEWISH HOSPITAL FOR CONSUMPTIVES

By REV. DR. WM. S. FRIEDMAN, Rabbi of Temple Emanuel, Denver, Colorado

The history of the National Jewish Hospital for Consumptives dates back to that time when poor consumptives all over America began to flock to Denver.

The exhilarating effects of the climate had been widely advertised, and its curative properties were recommended by the medical profession.

The Jews of Denver were appealed to from the pulpit of Temple Emanuel, to provide for the hundreds of stricken sufferers.

So numerous were the applicants for aid that it was soon found impossible to shelter and care for the impoverished victims of tuberculosis.

A building of substantial proportions was constructed, but after its completion it could not be maintained by the Jews of Denver.

The Independent Order of B'nai B'rith came to the rescue. At a meeting of the Grand Lodge, District No. 2, held in Louisville, Ky., May 18, 1898, it was decided to endorse the efforts of establishing a Hospital for Consumptives at Denver.

A provisional Board of Control was appointed, which secured as president of the institution, Samuel Grabfelder. This fortunate choice gave new enthusiasm to the work, and Mr. Grabfelder still continues as an inspiration to the institution.

On December 10, 1899, the doors of the hospital were opened.

At the meeting of the Grand Lodge held in Chicago, April 29, 1900, the committee on charitable and educational institutions, in their report stated as follows:

"We have also considered with care the existing and proposed relations between our Order and the National Jewish Hospital for Consumptives located at Denver, Colo.

"The Hospital is not local, either to Denver, to the State of Colorado, or to any portion of the Union. It was not established to meet a local condition or to gratify local pride.

"We do not favor the proposal to convey the hospital to the Order and bring it under our exclusive dominion. This would not be good either for the hospital or the Order. But we do favor such a relation between the two as will give to the hospital the use of our organized machinery, our sanction and a substantial financial support."

The B'nai B'rith therefore recommended that the hospital be incorporated under the laws of Colorado.

The B'nai B'rith also recommended, beginning with January 1, 1901, that the Constitution Grand Lodge shall pay a per capita contribution.

This Convention requested that the B'nai B'rith be represented by one member from each of the seven Districts.

The suggestions of the Constitution Grand Lodge were incorporated in the laws of the hospital, and the president of the Constitution Grand Lodge was made ex-officio a member of the Board.

The subvention of the Constitution Grand Lodge was gradually increased to forty cents per capita.

Ever since the doors of the hospital were opened, the presidents of the B'nai B'rith, Leo N. Levi, of sainted memory; Simon Wolf, his successor, and the present incumbent, Adolph Kraus, have enthusiastically championed the life-saving work of the institution.

Without the encouragement and support of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith, the National Jewish Hospital for Consumptives may never have become a reality.

From one building with a capacity of sixty beds, the hospital has now grown to ten buildings, with a capacity of one hundred and fifty.

There are the Guggenheim Pavilion, used exclusively for men, the gifts of the Guggenheim Brothers; the Woman's Pavilion, which was constructed from the contributions of Jews throughout the country; the Adolph Lewisohn Chapel, the gift of the well known New York philanthropist; the Shoenberg Memorial, the gift of Mrs. Joseph E. Shoenberg, and Mrs. Hermon August; the Grabfelder Medical Building, the gift of the president of the institution; the infirmary, the dining room, laundry, boiler house, superindendent's bungalow.

Since the opening of the hospital 3,000 patients have been admitted, from all sections of the country. New York sends one-third, and Chicago one-fifth. Three hundred patients are treated annually; the average stay in the hospital is seven months.

The patients are under the direction of the superintendent, first and second assistant medical superintendent, the medical advisory board of five, eight nurses and a staff of thirty consulting physicians.

Ex-patients who remain in Denver may claim the treatment of the hospital's externe, who averages fifty calls a month, and the visiting nurse, who, during the past year, paid 2,476 visits.

It is axiomatic that fresh air, flooded with sunshine, good food, and life in the open are the specific for phthisis. The consumptive who has the opportunity of enjoying these requisites has by far the best chance to recover.

Three-fifths of the patients admitted to the hospital have been discharged as recovered, or with disease arrested; one-fifth were greatly improved, the remaining one-fifth having been cases that were far advanced, of which a number were discharged as unimproved, and some died in the hospital.

A suitable diet is essential in the treatment of tuberculosis. Food must be varied and appetizing. The weight charts show how carefully the matter of diet is considered.

The moral and mental condition of the patient is often as seriously involved, as his physical state. The management of the National Jewish Hospital has stressed this part of its work.

While it has not been possible to persuade the patients to perform as much work as would perhaps be good for them, a number of the inmates are assisting in the work of the various departments of the hospital, such as helping in the laboratory, in the library, secretary's office, dining room, diet kitchen and on the grounds. Their experience along these lines has been of great assistance in fitting them for good positions.

Many patients who come to the hospital without knowledge, or with only limited familiarity with the English language, enjoy the opportunity in the Shoenberg Memorial Building to learn to read and write the vernacular. They eagerly accept the training they receive in the school. The class in English is supplemented by a domestic science department for women; a class in bookkeeping; a tailoring class, where men who understand only the rudiments of their trade, are instructed in the more advanced lines of tailoring.

The library is the meeting place of the patients. It contains 1,500 volumes adapted to the needs of the patients. Here they read and write and play games of chess, checkers, dominoes, etc.

There is also an amusement room, where entertainments are held, and where moving pictures are exhibited weekly.

The social service work that is carried on in the Shoenberg Memorial Building is conducted without expense to the institution. Hermon August has endowed this building.

Two years ago Louis D. Shoenberg gave to the hospital a farm in memory of his only son, Dudley C. Shoenberg. This farm supplies products for the health of the patients.

Last January Samuel Grabfelder built and thoroughly equipped the Grabfelder Medical Building. It includes examination rooms, laboratories, drug room, X-ray equipment, animal quarters for experimental purposes and a medical library. This building adds one of the greatest units of efficiency to the hospital.

The hospital is now so thoroughly equipped for medical research work that some tangible results will probably ensue. There can be no question that the National Jewish Hospital for Consumptives is the most thoroughly organized institution in the world for the treatment of tuberculosis. Not only is the physical welfare of the patient most zealously guarded, but his mental and moral well being are of equal concern; not only are the patients supervised while in the hospital, but their after-care is as thoroughly considered.

It is impossible to estmate the number of people who have benefited by the work of the institution. Thousands of families have been rendered self-dependent, because the head of the family has been cured in the hospital.

The lesson of sanitary living, taught in the institution, is almost as important as the medical care and treatment received.

All honor to the Order, and to those men and women who contribute toward the maintenance of this institution. May God give them the strength to continue their work.

The B'nai B'rith Building at Portland, Oregon

The B'nai B'rith building in Portland is situated on 13th street, near Market. It faces a fine, wide street and is within a few minutes' walk of the heart of the city. It is a two-story, brick building of Tudor style, having 100 feet frontage and 100 feet in depth.

A history of the building should begin with some years ago when many foresaw its need. We had, and still have, a settlement house, erected and managed by the Portland Council of Jewish Women, that is doing more than any other single effort ever attempted by Portland Jewry. We had, too, a Concordia Club, the leading Jewish social organization, but for the many of the middle classes, the hundreds of young men and young women with few ties to religious [illegible] or institutions having some Jewish character, there was no central force to attract them. The large Jewish activities were more or less spasmodic. There was lacking cohesion. To meet this condition a group of men resolved to erect a building that would be a fit place to serve as a popular club with all modern helpful [illegible], a place attractive for the best yet within the reach of all. The first effort was to raise $10,000, but within a very short time $20,000 was subscribed. We incorporated under the name of B'nai B'rith Building Association and purchased certain property that later we sold at a gross profit of about $[illegible]. Other property was purchased and the building erected about [illegible] 1914 and altogether, with equipment, represents an outlay of some $50,000. The gymnasium and swimming tank are of the finest and largest in the city, with the usual accessories of lockers, dressing rooms, physical director's room, showers, etc. A large hand-ball court attracts many to our building. The billiard room now holds three tables, but is constructed to hold several more. There are a half dozen card, checker and chess tables.

A boys' club room is a meeting place for young people. At present a Jewish young men's and women's club of some hundred members meets there regularly. It is intended to make this also a youths' reading room and library.

The men's hall is a large, beautiful place, handsomely fitted out, splendily ventilated, with fine acoustics. The women's hall is a very pretty place and connects with a kitchen. The men's and women's halls may, by opening certain doors, be connected together, and by opening certain other double doors, these are made one with the big gymnasium, thus forming a very large place that may be used for extraordinary purposes.

The lobby is a large hall, richly furnished, and a delightful place in which to lounge, read and visit.

A suite of rooms provides for a janitor and his family.

Membership to all the benefits of the building costs $1.00 per month. To members of the B'nai B'rith only 50 cents per month. But to members of the B'nai B'rith who do not desire the use of the gymnasium and swimming tank, the building is free.

The expected visit of the delegates to the Constitution Grand Lodge (which meets in San Francisco in May), on their return trip via Portland, will give the opportunity to inspect this building, which is to become the Jewish communal center, and fill a long felt want.

Great credit is due the board of trustees of the B. B. Building Association in making such a building possible, but the main stay through the years of effort toward the realization was Bro. Isaac Swett, Past Grand President of this District, one of the leading attorneys of the city.

far the bureaucracy is tainted with Prussianism innate or cultivated is a question we cannot undertake to solve. For bureaucrats likewise are the same all the world over. And the Prussian variety is probably not a whit better or worse than in many another country. Nor would we be persuaded that the benign Czar excels his royal cousins in the West in loftiness of purpose. For after all to be well-meaning and at the same time to lack the will to make oneself felt and to carry one's good intentions into effect is a questionable virtue.

The truth of the matter is that it is rather difficult to pronounce judgment on any nation. But when the question comes home to us Jews, we know from an experience stretching over centuries with whom we may be at ease and from whom we may expect naught but vexatious hostility. We would like ourselves to indulge in optimistic vision and join in the paean to the Russia of the future, as it will emerge out of this war, regenerated, chastened, freed. We fear these may be but dreams and illusions. We are apprehensive that Russia victorious will be more overbearing than it is today. Forgotten will be the pledges if any have been given in the hour of need when in the face of a formidable war machine solidarity meant enhancing the powers offensive and defensive possessed by the unwieldy hordes of Russia. We have heard of promises held out to the Poles; that they will not be kept or, if kept for the moment, that opportunity and pretext will be found for making them nugatory, the Poles themselves ought to be wise enough to know from past experience. We have heard of no promises made to the Jew. We know rather that wounded Jewish soldiers are turned out from localities outside the Pale. Even under the stress of present conditions no move is being made to lighten the hardships of Jewry. Ask our brethren in Czardom and they will tell you that the outlook after the war is gloomy indeed. The Jews will have laid down their lives on the battlefields; driven from their homes they will have lost their big and little possessions; impoverished and reduced to beggary, they will be still penned up in the Pale with no egress to the wide dominions in the interior. As for rights, nothing but a revolution in Russia's mode of treating those of her subjects who are not of the orthodox Greek persuasion will work surcease. But how is Muscovite policy to be revolutionized? Certainly, not as a result of victory. Victors are not given to self-searching. Success makes them only prouder and more self-seeking.

The Allies are pounding their way through the straits of the Dardanelles toward Constantine's city so long out of the hands of Edom Israel's archfoe. Will they turn over the city and the straits to Holy Russia? As a war measure we full well understand the purpose. Russia lacks ammunition wherewith to fight off the redoubtable Prussian commander and the Allies are short of food. The straits are to be opened that ammunitions and food may be carried in and out. But is the Byzantian dominion to be restored under the Russian bear? Shall the Mediterranean become open to Russian maritime craft? All of which may already have been decided upon. It is quite possible that England will shut the straits of Gibraltar except for her own use and that of France. We discern the nucleus of future conflict which will divide the amicable entente. And there is no telling what the future may harbor in the way of alliances and counter-alliances. The present union between East and West is so unnatural that it cannot possibly be lasting.

The Czar will probably continue to be benign on the surface. For it is on the surface only that he may ever be said to have possessed any feeling of humanity. We still abide by our often repeated opinion that far from being benign the Czar is at heart a cruel despot. Be that as it may, he will still be surrounded by a powerful clique which will exercise in his name real authority. And the Russian people, the masses we mean, will continue to be a tool in the hands of malvolent demagogues. The Russian Jew cannot discern the faintest ray of hope on the political horizon. For him there is the prospect of further discrimination and persecution. It is the business of Muscovy to allay our suspicions. It is for the Czar and his entourage to show by actual deeds that they mean well with the Jew. Until that is done, we shall maintain our agitation on behalf of our unfortunate brethren. Holy Russia must not be whitewashed; for what we ask of her is a change of heart, a radical transformation of her attitude to her Jews who so nobly stand by her today.

NATHANIEL MAYER ROTHSCHILD.

Lord Rothschild, a member of the English branch of the Rothschild family, died on March 31, 1915. He was born in London in November, 1840, the son of the late Baron Lionel Nathan de Rothschild, whose father was Baron Nathan Mayer de Rothschild, who was the son of Mayer Emschel Rothschild, the founder of the great Rothschild banking-house.

He was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, where, as a student, he was one of the associates of King Edward VII.

He was a member of Parliament for twenty years, up to the time when he was raised to the Peerage in 1885, and as Baron Rothschild was the first Jew to sit in the House of Lords. He held the office of Lord-Lieutenant of the county of Buckingham for many years; was a Privy-Counsellor; and was the recipient of the Grand Cross of the Royal Victorian Order.

Lord Rothschild was well known for his deep interest in all matters appertaining to Judaism; for his liberality, not only as far as financial support was concerned, but also for the personal service that he rendered. He filled the position of president of the United Synagogue and also that of warden of the Great Synagogue. Jewry in England recognized in him the lay head of the Jewish community. During the time of the Kishineff massacre he was chairman of the committee having in charge the collection of funds from all over the world to relieve the sufferers of the massacre. In all calamities that befell the Jewish people he proved himself a staunch friend and a most liberal giver.

He was a lover of art and gathered many art treasures. He was a conspicuous figure in many activities, and while much may be said about his character, his lovable disposition, his exemplary home life and his devotion to Judaism, his entire career may be crystallized in the few words that he was a loyal patriot, an exemplary citizen and a good Jew.

May his memory be written in the Book of Life.

THE DEATH OF BROTHER SALOMON PERLHEFTER.

In the death of the Imperial Counsellor Brother Salomon Perlhefter of the city of Bruenn, which took place on February 18, in the sixty-third year of his life, District Grand Lodge No. 10, and especially Moravia Lodge No. 456 of Bruenn, have sustained a great loss. Brother Perlhefter joined the Order of B'nai B'rith nineteen years ago and became one of the best and most active members of Moravia Lodge, where he was repeatedly elected as President. District Grand Lodge No. 10 also recognized his valuable services to the Order and elected him a member of the General Committee, in which office he often distinguished himself by his great ability and warm love for the Order. In the city of Bruenn, where he was the owner of a prominent business house, he stood very high in commercial circles on account of his honorable character and he occupied a very prominent social position by reason of his unselfishness. He was a member of the Board of Directors of the local Jewish congregation and belonged to all the important societies for the welfare of humanity in the city of Bruenn. As a Jew he was an honor to Judaism; as a citizen, the city where he lived was proud of him, and as a Ben B'rith the Order blesses his memory. May his soul rest in peace.

Anti-Defamation League Protest

The Illustrated Weekly of the Los Angeles Times published recently a story entitled: "While Court Was Adjourned." The story was so injurious in its effect, and so likely to arouse prejudice against the Jewish people, that the League was constrained to address a protest to the editor. The following letter is selected from the correspondence and is reprinted here because of its innate interest independent of the controversy which gave rise to its being written:

March 9, 1915.

Harrison Gray Otis, Editor,
Los Angeles Times,
Los Angeles, Cal.

Dear Sir:

Your letter of the 22nd, inst., came duly to hand. It, no doubt, is extremely difficult for a non-Jew, who has not made a study of the subject, to appreciate the situation and feeling of the Jewish body in reference to defamation of their people. The very purpose of our organization is education, so that we may be able to bring before those who have a large part in the shaping of public opinion a true understanding of this matter. We have never heard of the charge that the Los Angeles Times is "against the Jews," and we are quite confident that your publication is no different from newspapers in general in that regard, and that there has been no preconceived intent to defame in certain articles that have been published. In nearly every instance, we find that matters, which are defamatory, are published without due consideration of their possible consequences, and without the least intent to hurt the feelings of any part of our public. You make the statement that we are supersensitive. We make an earnest effort to be conservative and to weigh carefully all matters called to our attention. Knowing that in matters of this character, we are ever charged with supersensitiveness, we take special care so that our action may not be attacked validly on this ground. If we fail in this, we can assure you that it is only after the most earnest efforts have been made not to be subjected thereto.

We wish to lay before you the peculiar situation of the Jewish body, so that you may appreciate why we protest against the publication of articles—particularly in fiction—which portray the mean, disagreeable, dishonest or criminal individual, personified by a Jewish character. In every country, the Jew represents but a small minority. He has no central power. There is no Jewish nation or Jewish country. In this regard, he differs from all other peoples of the earth. For many centuries, he was subjected to bitter religious persecution. He was charged with being the cause of all the misfortunes that befell the country wherein he happened to live. Thus, he was held responsible by the general public of mediaeval Europe with causing the scourge of the Black Death. He has been charged with a systematic effort to poison wells so as to kill off the Christian population. He has been charged with ritual murder, and so powerful were these charges of centuries ago, that they have defied even the enlightenment of modern centuries, so that we saw within the last year in Russia a case where an insignificant Jewish peasant was charged, in a court of law, with ritual murder. In later centuries, when religious persecution was diminished, the Jew became the subject of national and economic oppression, and finally, added to all this, came the social persecution. During all these centuries, these animosities against the Jew were reflected in literature, and the literature of the world on this subject has necessarily influenced the mind of today. Thus, the character of "Shylock," portrayed by Shakespeare, has been so fixed upon the public mind that "Shylock" typifies the Jewish character. Any man, who has honestly studied the Jewish character, knows that this is false. No matter how false the accusation directed against a people may be, the constant repetition of the same without contradiction gives to the same a presumption of authenticity. To illustrate: we frequently hear it said in an effort to describe the wealth of a man, that "he is as rich as a Jew," when as a matter of fact, the per capita wealth of the Jew is the lowest of any religious sect in this country, except that of the negro church. We know full well that there are Jews who do not measure up to the standards of citizenship or morality. We do not claim for the Jew that he is any better than his neighbor. We do, however, claim that he is just as good in citizenship and morality. The one great evil that has burdened the Jew is that the general public are always willing to accept the short-comings and idiosyncrasies of the individual Jew as typifying the characteristics of the Jew in general. Thus, if a criminal, either in fiction or in news item, is described as a Jew, it leaves the impression upon the general public that here is a crime for which the Jews in general are responsible. No other people in this country suffer from this peculiar state of affairs as does the Jew. If a Protestant commit a crime, he is regarded as an outcast, as one who has not lived up to his religious teachings, as one who has none of the virtues which characterize his brethren. If a member of any other Christian religious sect does the same, no stigma attaches to the rest of his people. But if a Jew commits a crime, immediately comment states: "All Jews are alike." Even when applied to nationalities, the same is true. Thus a German or a Frenchman may be convicted of a crime, it would not reflect any material discredit upon their fellow Germans or fellow Frenchmen. But when a malefactor is described as a Jew, it injures the entire Jewish body, and another dose of poisonous prejudice has been fed to the world. Our organization was effected to mitigate this evil so far as lay in our power. We are asking that the general Jewish body shall not suffer because of the demerits of particular individuals. We may not be able to wipe out prejudice, existing in the general mind against the Jew, a prejudice which has been created and strengthened by almost twenty centuries of defamation and persecution. With the co-operation of those who have the power to form public opinion, we believe we can stop the increase of prejudice and eventually relieve the public mind of sordid antipathies, so that the Jew, as his fellow man, may be judged as an individual, and that each shall have such credit for his conduct and character as he may deserve.

You state in your letter that when creditable things are said of the Jew in the Times, that no response or objection is made. If any matters are published, concerning the Jewish people which help to bring before the public the value that the Jew has been to civilization, or which give proper credit to the sacrifices and heroism of those who have suffered because they were Jews, there can be no question but that the action on the part of such papers meets with an appreciative response in the heart of every good Jew but the Jew does not claim any credit for what some individual Jews may accomplish in their individual vocations or endeavors. Thus the discoveries of Professor Ehrlich cannot be credited to the Jews, merely because Dr. Ehrlich happens to be a Jew. His contributions to civilization and science belong to the German nation, where he was educated and where he lived and which nation perhaps made his discoveries possible. The same is true of the discoveries of Dr. Flexner. His contributions to science cannot be claimed by the Jews. They are American contributions, as it is an American institution which gave him the opportunity.

We trust that we have made ourselves clear on this subject matter. It is a large subject, which cannot be fully and sufficiently treated in a letter, but if you are further interested, and have the time and inclination to do so, we would recommend for your perusal two books which set forth the matter in all its phases: "Anti-Semitism" by Bernard Lazare, a non-Jew, and "Prejudice" by Dr. Joseph Krauskopf of Philadelphia, Pa., Dean of American rabbis.

Very respectfully,
EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE,
Sigmund Livingston,
Chairman.

THE JEWISH SOUL.

(A free reproduction of a German Poem.)

'Tis true,—we are not faultless;
We would not have it so,
We hold our lives as human,
And not as white as snow.

Ye mock us in derision,
Complain, condemn unfair;
Yet ye, of strict decision, demand not: "Whence nor where."

"Whence," ask ye? We will answer:
The way was rough, ill-kept,
The which we trod through ages,
The while we bled and wept.

Expelled from native glebe-land,
Exiled from quiet home
Like unto nomads destined
From land to land to roam.

No rest for weary footsteps,
No respite for our tears
By lands that bore us hated—
Our future—only fears.

"Where?" Mark the chase of hunters,
With hate in every breath;
Submersion, pain and death.

If, then, from slime of travel,
From persecution's blood
Not all our dress is spotless,
Not all our actions good,

Have ye a right to taunt us,
To scorn us from above?
Go, ask of one another:
"Is this our God-taught love?"

—Israel Cowen.

Will Not the Lords of the Earth Do Justice?

For the past seven, eight and nine months the cry of unfortunate Belgium has rung in your ears. And moved by the suffering and the tragedy, the whole-hearted sympathy of the entire world has been poured out in answer. Nowhere the inclination to stop to inquire whether the Belgians were wise or foolish, right or wrong in the stand they took. All that concerned the world was that the once smiling, peaceful and industrious country lay wrecked and desolate under a conqueror's iron heel. Crushed and overwhelmed by superior forces, thousands were dead, wounded, sick and dying, hundreds of thousands wandered homeless, hungry and forlorn. The world simply could not see and hear, and remain indifferent.

More recently, the still sorrier plight of divided Poland has challenged the world's pity; and no more in this instance than in the other can the world hear of its anguish with callous heart. If Belgium was crushed and broken, this country and people have literally been torn to shreds by the passing and repassing armies. Whole cities have ceased to exist. The all-pervading horror and misery beggar description. However slowly the fearful situation is being completely appreciated, yet sooner or later the organized effort of society must be moved to do for Poland what it has already done for Belgium.

And pouring out its sympathy and succor, impartial humanity undoubtedly harbors the fervent conviction that when the bloodshed and carnage are over, justice demands that Belgium should be restored to its independence, and a re-united, autonomous Poland should be established, to make amends for the injustice of the past as for the suffering of the present. This conviction is entirely independent of all partisanship, and of all other questions that are involved in this world conflict. But, without question, such is the feeling which does prevail. Positively and warmly, this the reward which the world at large believes the Belgian and Pole have earned as their right. This the very least by reason of their heroic endurance and patriotic sacrifices, to which they are entitled.

But what, then, of Israel, the Poland and Belgium, not of the few months or years, but of twenty centuries of suffering, persecution and injustice? While the world thus rightly listens to the cry and sympathizes with the cause of these other unfortunates, will it not also be able to remember the millions of Jews in eastern Europe who suffer under trials and atrocities in comparison with which the misery of their fellow sufferers almost pale into insignificance? Or, assuming that in the end the help rendered their companions in misery will also bind their wounds and assuage their pains, will not the world as readily demand justice for the Jew as it calls for justice for the Belgian and the Pole?

When the time comes, and the embassadors of the world's powers come together to attempt to discover what the war may have decided, will these powers of the earth occupy themselves so completely with Belgian, Polish, Italian, Turkish and other questions that they will seem to have no time or patience for the Jew and the Jewish Question? Or will not the lords of the earth do justice in such a way that the Jewish Question too, shall receive the attention it merits? Will they not at least make the effort to solve this question as humanity demands, and thus help hasten the day when the age-long unmerited tribulations of the Jew shall have finally ceased?

Surely, when suggesting this idea, there can be and there is no need for the Jew again to "justify" or "vindicate" himself, his character or his religion in the eyes of civilization. We know, and the world knows, that if Belgium in the present hour may need defence for the course it dared to take in standing for its rights, honor and manhood, then perhaps Israel, too, may need defence for its past history. But if, apart from all other considerations which may be involved, the world rightly appreciates that the Belgians have the right to be proud of their courageous resistance and patriotism, then as truly may Israel be proud of its heroic course. For, as Belgium in the thirty and forty weeks, so Israel for two thousand years. In the face of a world that opposed and misunderstood, it battled and bled for the right of the handful, the minority and the individual, as opposed to the tyranny of the mob, the majority and the materially powerful. In the spirit of the Prophets, standing on the foundation of The Law, it dared and endured for the [illegible] of its faith.

[illegible] of these things the Jew does not [illegible] special privileges, glory or honor of the world at this or at any other time. He does hold the faith that when the day comes when mankind has the eyes to see and the heart to understand, his story will serve as an inspiration to all who would serve God and man in the true spirit of service. But now, scattered as he is among the nations of the earth, and suffering as he does in the present hour, all that he asks is that he shall not be singled out as the victim of especial cruelty and injustice. All that he would hope for is that he may be granted the equality which is his due among the peoples of the earth.

Let it be granted, now and at all times, that the Jew as an individual is no more perfect than any other type of man. But we know, and the world knows, that it is not the character of the Jew which, in the past, has been responsible for the treatment he has received at the hands of his fellows, any more than it is his character today which makes the treatment he is accorded in Russia and eastern Europe generally. What the Russian Jew is, does and achieves when given opportunity in America is all the "vindication" which the Russian Jew can possibly require. So also with the achievement of the Jew generally and his service to society in America, France, England, Germany and all other lands where he is granted his rights as a man.

At the present moment as at no other time, as the war is demanding especial sacrifices on the part of all classes, let Germany, England, France and the rest bear witness to the true character, manhood and patriotism of the Jew. In the armies of the battling nations he, too, is enrolled and in the fullest numbers. He, too, battles and dies bravely for his fatherland. In the face of his soldier's wounds let it be for the last time that we have heard the charge that the Jews form an international organization whose interests are not alone different from but inimical to the interests of the nations among whom they dwell.

Presenting these truths and facts before the world at this time, there is no need for the Jew to press his cause with the slightest bitterness or rancor. However natural such bitterness may well be in the hearts of the Jews of Eastern Europe, who continue to suffer most terribly, there is nothing to be gained and much which may be lost by giving expression to any such feeling. All that is required is that with calmness and self-respect the Jew shall press his case, with all fairness and with all fearlessness.

May we of the house of Israel also appreciate that coming to plead our cause at the bar of nations, it is most essential that we ourselves should come to that hour with undivided council and purpose. Some of us may believe that the salvation of Israel and the complete solution of the Jewish Question will only be found in a return to Palestine. Others of us may be just as certain that our mission requires that we continue to dwell scattered among the nations. In this country, or abroad, we may be members of one or another of a dozen different national or inter-national organizations. Or we may be of those who press our way unhampered by allegiance to any party or by membership in any group. But in some way, it is necessary, that through a Jewish Congress, or any other means that can be made feasible, we shall work out some sort of an agreement and understanding which will enable those who represent Israel to speak with the authority of a united Israel to give power to their work.

If in spite of this need, it should still prove impossible for all to agree to stand on some common platform, at least let us not be guilty of secretly or openly opposing one another in the work we would do for the common good. In the past, as we know, in times of crisis, it has always been the internal dissensions of Israel which have worked as much harm as the outer foe. Let us have the wisdom to profit from this experience. Let us be big enough to realize that for all our possible pride of opinion, or organization, or whatever else it may be, it is the cause of Israel and not our personal or party interest for which we are striving. Let us be guided accordingly.

If some of us are only able to be interested in obtaining a home in Palestine, and the Powers may be interested, all right and good. If others can only be interested in putting an end to the all-too-many inequalities and disabilities under which the Jew suffers in Russia and in other lands, all well and good, too. But standing on one and the same platform or not, let us but remember that we are all equally interested in seeing to it, that whatever may or may not be accomplished, the right of the Jew shall be recognized, to be treated as the equal of his fellowmen, in whatever spot or corner of the earth he may find his home. Together, we are all concerned that it should be made impossible for any people or government to repeat in the Twentieth Century the Roumanian trick of the Nineteenth. So, though our methods of helping may have to differ,—if differ they have to—let us be one in heart and soul—one in spirit and fellowship in our whole-souled ambition to serve in the common cause. So may the common cause of Israel which is also the cause of common humanity, be truly served.

Justice is all that the cause of Israel seeks. Justice at the hands of the world is all for which the Jew would hope. Granting the Jew this justice, which is his due, thus may the world finally put an end to the Jewish Question which has been such a blot on civilization for these endless generations. So at last may the day come when the Jew shall be enabled to live in peace among his fellowmen, to utilize his entire energy in the fulfillment of his historic mission as a priest people among the nations of the earth. Thus may the day hasten when racial, national and religious differences will have ceased to divide mankind into armed and warring camps, to establish the brotherhood of man as a reality and not as a mere name on the face of the earth.

The Living Dead

By Dr. Schmarya Levin.

We, in America, are far removed from the great Jewish world, where one of the most terrible storms in our history is now raging, leaving desolation behind it. We read the reports that come from the other side of the sea and we must make more or less of a hazardous surmise as to the extent of the devastation—we must simply trust to the power of our imagination to conjure up before us a vision of the ruin described in the reports. But the strength of our imagination must transport us first many thousands of miles before it finds itself in the field of its operations. There must be a gigantic transportation in our thoughts before we come close to our brothers, before we can see their wounds, before we can hear their moans—before we can have the whole scheme in front of us in all its detail. And thougths, too, become wearied out by too long journeying; often, too, they become rebellious, and very often they refuse to fulfill their mission and turn back when only half of it has been completed.

There is a friend now sitting with me. He has only just arrived from "over yonder." I ask him to tell me, to tell me everything he saw, everything he heard. I feel somehow that I have been remiss, that I am not conscious of my debt. Always I hear a voice of reproof—an inner voice. Someone seems to be dissatisfied with me, and the torture grows on me. I pray my friend to tell me everything: perhaps by his recitals he will pacify me somewhat. I know very well that I will become more restless, that my thoughts will turn to fire, my feelings will become keener, more corrosive, and that I myself will be drawn with my soul nearer to the desolation. I want to stand face to face with the desolation, to look upon it with my own eyes. I cannot be at peace with myself as long as I am not restless. I long for a storm to arise in me, to uplift me, to hurl me from place to place and then dash me to the ground. I do not want to be a criminal any longer; I do not want to sleep in my soft bed any longer, nor rise every morning as if the world were moving along its old grooves, nor, as if nothing untoward were taking place, don my creased and immaculate clothes, take my usual walk and enjoy life as I am wont to do. I feel that only when the storm should flash down upon me and drive me into my exile, my exile within an exile, that then only would I be more at peace with myself, then only would that inner voice cease from its reproving. At last I am with my own, I am with those to whom I belong; I am blown about like a grain of sand in a whirlwind, I am sharing the fare of my brothers.

And I pray my friend to tell me all. Perhaps the living word will awaken me, bring me to myself—for I feel that there is something unclean in me and that something of me has ceased from living.

And my friend begins to tell me. Steadily and placidly he speaks, using the simplest words: "All that you have read is true. Should any one of us seek to overstate the truth, he could not; for we are living in times when prose outruns poetry and truth outruns imagination. Truth has reached her consummation; further she cannot go. In a word, all that you have read is true; but you have not read the whole of the truth. There are certain things about which they do not write—they are afraid that it would be taken for gross exaggerations. All the information that has reached you comes from certain known places, which can be located. But there are certain scattered and obscure regions, in which you will find devastated villages; and in these villages you will find exploded, shattered, delapidated houses, and in these houses you will find the "living dead." There they lie, "like tombstones on their own graves"—pious Jews, that were once worthy paterfamilias. Today they do not stir themselves; they do not want you to take pity on them: then repulse every offer of sympathy. Sometimes, by chance, there come to these half-living, half-dead, brothers from other cities, sent to them by a relief committee, and they bring with them food and clothing. But they refuse the clothing: they argue: "No clothes can ever cover the shame of the lost honor of our daughters." They refuse the food: they argue: "No nourishment can ever build up again a shattered soul." They argue "It is all futile." Then they argue no more: only in their half-extinguished eyes a dim light breaks out now and again, a last faint link with the world. And these blind glances argue dumbly, saying: "The end of all things is come; and when the great end comes it is not for us to avoid it, nor for us to try to put it off."

A torpid despair has fallen on these scattered and desolated ones. It has built its nest on the Jewish desolation, and now broods over the whole of the Jewish world. Life has lost its worth, its taste has evaporated, and only the shadow remains of it, a tombstone in a desolate place. And wheresoever there was left something of the sanctity of life, there came the brutes and defiled it. And these lost souls are left amongst the ruins, drowned in their despair, ashamed to look upon God's earth and upon themselves. And there are thousands of victims, innocent and unsinning scattered in these devasted places. Only no one speaks of them, for the same dumbness of despair that seized them has fallen upon the others.

This, in short, is what my friend related to me. And, most wonderful—my friend did it become in any way impassioned: there was not a suspicion of a tremor in his voice, nor a shadow of mental agitation. And again most wonderful—on me, too, the recitals made no deep impression; they did not call forth in me any new emotions, neither pity for the victims, nor thirst for vengeance on the wild desolators. On the contrary, I felt somehow that my anger and my powers of protest were becoming weaker and weaker: another leaden cloud has crept over the heavens, the atmosphere becomes more and more oppressive and the feelings become so blunt that they can no longer pierce the gathering thickness. Imagination has lost its wings, and now sinks to earth like a leaden bird. I cannot, simply cannot, describe what is going on over there. That which has taken place hitherto has exhausted me in the imagining of it, and now I cannot move into the future and imagine what that will be like: for I am blinded by the present.

And that is the torpid despair which creeps across to us also from the other side of the sea. We feel that we have no one to whom to talk. The world is taken up—she has other troubles on her hand, nearer interests. Attention is now a rare and priceless object. It is given to those that have the earlier claim, to those who are a little related. We are amongst the strangers, the distant ones. And we ourselves are too weak, too unorganized. We exert ourselves to give help, but there is no might in our attempt, we lack the strength that lies in hope.

There is help for the Belgian, for the Pole, for the Serb; they will return to their ploughs, to their fields. They will remain in their own homes, whoever it be that will rule over them. Whither will return—nay, whither will turn our lonely and suffering ones? Where will they find a resting place today, and what will the morrow bring forth for them.

But have we ever taken thought for the morrow? Has not our policy always been suited to the passing moment, cut from hand to mouth, with perspectives broad as a thumb and long as a finger? And when men came with broader and longer perspectives, and warned us and called us and sought to awaken in us a national will, how did we receive them? At first we simply ignored them—they did not exist: then we began to laugh at them at the top of our voices: and in the end we came out in open enmity against them in a campaign of bitter hate.

A torpid despair has been poured out upon us, and in the Jewish world there reigns a universal apathy. And this torpidity I wish to conquer—I wish to tear it out of its hold over me. It has locked my energy in its chains—it has left me feeble, helpless. There is a vision floating before my eyes—the vision of the "living dead" in these obscure and scattered corners. They refuse all help, they express no wish, and when something is proffered them to keep body and soul together, they have but one thing to say—without anger, without offence—short, and full of an agonizing bewilderment: "No, thank you."

And in this "Thank you," there can be heard no gratitude—only a dumb protest.

NEWS FROM LONDON

By Our Correspondent Dr. M. Epstein

London, March 21, 1915.

Early this month the National Evangelical Free Church Council held its annual conference at Manchester. The gathering is always regarded as an important one; in this year of accursed war it is specially significant to note the tone of its deliberations. Moreover, it is the first religious conference that has assembled since the war broke out, and therefore it is doubly interesting to observe the sentiments that prevailed. What do we find? The more earnest thinkers, both among the laity and clergy, cannot help realizing that, as one speaker at Manchester put it, "this war registers the calamitous failure of organized or rather disorganized Christianity." It is a sad confession; honest men of all creeds must deplore its truth. If Christian principles had been truly believed in; if they had really moulded men's lives, shaping the course of progress towards the high ideal of the seers of all ages (our own included), the wholesale destruction of life, the active propaganda of hatred, the transvaluation of all values that civilization has so laboriously built up would have been unthinkable. Have the churches in the past done all they could for the cause of peace and for the creation of healthy international relations? The Free Church Council had to say no; and it is sad beyond words to have to chronicle the fact.

Of course, the cynics may say that the churches are played out; that they no longer have any effective power; that they are merely corpses from which the soul has fled; that the press is mightier than the pulpit. All this may not be without a grain of truth. But can it be said with equal truth that Christianity itself has lost its power? Let the report on the Free Church Conference speak for itself. "The great message of the Conference," so we read, "has been that the duty of the churches, not only in this country, but throughout the world, is to cultivate an atmosphere of Christianity which will make war impossible." This requires no further comment; the more so if we bear in mind that neither Protestants nor Catholics as such have raised their voice in protest against the evils of the war. Only the Quakers have set their face against it. All honor to them!

May not thinking and earnest men now say, Come, let us reason together? Let us look facts in the face. Let us be honest and without prejudice. The interest of humanity is what we have at heart; let us consider its sad condition. The world around us was made up of political units, all attempting to sing the song of progress in their own tongue. The music was the same; only the words were different. Now for each political system certain ideals formed the basis of the structure. These taught humanity, social justice, temperance, consideration for the stranger, for the weak, for the fatherless, for the widow; they taught that human life was precious—was it not the be-all and end-all of all progress? The ideals resounded through the earth, but the present conditions plainly show that they were nothing but sound—vox et preteria nihil. In peace as in war, in rack-landlordism and sweated trades no less than in torpedoing passenger steamers without warning or shooting the wounded in the trenches, the effective influence of Christian teaching or the protest of the Christian conscience is sadly to be missed. Is it a wonder that men are asking whether Christianity can furnish the morally highest social foundation for the economics and politics of modern states?

Now there is one organized system of ideals that has produced excellent citizens in all lands, which for two thousands years has never once had a chance of showing what it could do for a state. We refer to Judaism, the mother-religion of Christianity. At this time is it too much to ask that Judaism be given a chance in this direction? Let Jews have an opportunity of showing the world what sort of a thing a Jewish political organism would be. We do not use the word state advisedly. A state conveys something definite; a political organism indicates what is meant without actually making clear its specific nature. Of course, it may be that a Jewish political organism may turn out as great a failure as its Christian prototype. On the other hand it may be a great success, a model to the world, "a light to the nations." Let it be remembered that a Jewish political organism would have two advantages. It would start anew with a clean slate; and it would be composed of human units who in the last twenty centuries have developed qualities of sobriety and moderation, whose sense of parental duty is universally acknowledged, who care for "the things that are more excellent." Imagine such a social organism on some territory, without the social evils of Western Europe and America, social evils which are spreading even to Japan. Would it not be a great thing? Should we not be witnesses of the realization of the prophecies of that great seer whom scholars call the Second Isaiah. "Thy people shall be all righteous; they shall inherit the land forever; the branch of my planting; the work of my hands that I may be glorified."

There are some people in this country to whom these thoughts are no mere dreams. They are no utopian idealists, visioning a new heaven and a new earth, but sane realists. In the re-arrangements that will follow the peace, why should not Palestine be made a Jewish political organism? Not that all Jews, but that Jews should go there. Let it be a model community. A foundation is there already. The Jewish colonies are little growths as yet, but they may go from strength to strength. It ought to be a welcome piece of news that among the Palestinian refugees in Egypt just now, there is not one Jewish colonist. These have preferred to stay on the soil they love so well. But this, by the way. Anyway the foundation is sound; this little item of news shows it. Man can now, in this twentieth century, conquer nature. He can fly in the clouds and hold the winds in leash; and he can make the sandy waste into a well-watered garden. It is all a question of determination. The will to do can accomplish the seemingly impossible. The will to do could make Palestine the joy of the whole earth. It is no use pretending to be too diplomatic. Diplomacy used to mean secrecy. There will not be much more of that. Demos is beginning to feel his power; like Samson of old the mighty giant is waking from his sleep, stretching his limbs "like a mighty man to run his course." Modern Democracies have an innate sense of justice on which we can rely. Put before them the position of the mass of Jews just now in all its piteousness, and the response will not be lacking. Fate would have it that an important war arena is a district in Europe much inhabited by Jews. They have been indigenous in Galicia from the earliest middle ages; and Poland, the land of the proud, has known them for many generations. As the opposing hosts meet in the clash of arms the Jews in the arena of war suffer beyond description. They are like to be ground small between the upper and the nether millstone. Economically their existence has been utterly crushed; as for suffering they are not unacquainted with it. Yes, but Serbia is suffering and Belgium is suffering. True. But Serbia has something to look forward to; so has Belgium, so Montenegro, as even Albania. What has the Russian Jew to look forward to? At best, he may be given what has been for long his due—the elementary rights of citizenship in Russia, and Roumania and the full, untrammeled, whole-hearted citizenship in the two great central European states. But is this so certain? The problem of the Russo-Polish Jews will be not only difficult; it will have so pitiful an aspect as to move all hearts that can feel.

It is comforting, therefore, that some people in this country are beginning to cast their minds to the Eastern Mediterranean as a resting place for the Jews. Apart from any question of terms of peace, it is obvious that so far as the Polish Jews are concerned the damage is done. What is to become of them? We are certain that our brethren (more especially our brethren) in Germany would support such a proposal. Give the Polish Jews a chance. It is true that they love the Russian soil with a passionate attachment; it is true that they have no quarrel with the Russian people, among the most tender-hearted in the world. But the existing regime is opposed to them. If no hope is to be found in Russia itself, give them hope elsewhere. And even if Russia should make herself morally and politically worthy of a place in the comity of nations, if the liberal spirit breathes through the land and makes possible for Russia that greatness of which the germs exist, even then the argument for a Jewish Palestine will still be strong. Albanians, Poles, Serbians, Czechs, all are to have their chance. Why not also Jews! Let the world make an experiment. Let it establish a new kind of political and social organism.

In the meantime we can only stand by and relieve the lot of the Polish and Galician Jews by sending them what money can buy. Here in this country no man has done more by direct personal influence than Mr. Hermann Landau. He carries his three score years and ten lightly enough, but it is heartening to see his wonderful enthusiasm. Close on £6,000 (say 30,000 dollars) have been collected already for the suffering Jews of Poland; more will be forthcoming. Be it remembered that this is not the only public appeal that is made in England just now. Another class of sufferers are the civil prisoners of war at Ruhleben in Germany. It is said (we have no means of getting exact information) that some 300 English Jews are in the camp there. Some of them are not blessed with this world's goods, and the London Lodge is stretching out a helping hand to the needy. It would take too long to enumerate the manifold problems that present themselves, all arising from the war. They are all being met bravely in the every-day work of life. Not the least is the question of Passover at the various hostels. One can imagine with what fervor our refugees will cry: this year we are enslaved; may we be free next year.

With all this our communal life proceeds apace. A new synagogue was opened in Newcastle the other day; another is being opened in Stamford Hill in North London this very afternoon. This is one more constituent of the United Synagogue which in its annual report states that its membership is 8,447 (of whom 2,928 are ladies). That this does not represent the total Jewish population of London goes without saying. But the proportion of the total is somewhat small. The truth is that our United Synagogue needs a new soul—nay, better put, it needs a soul. For all practical purposes it is for the most part a large burial society. You pay during your lifetime for a grave when you are dead. This sums up the attitude of mind of the majority of the 8,447. The income of the organization last year amounted to £46,285 (say 231,425 dollars) and its expenditure to £45,261 (say 226,305 dollars). Expressed in material values the year's working was thus a success. But ask anyone who knows what the verdict would be if we considered the spiritual values? We need waking up; perhaps the general stock-taking after the war may bring improvements here. They are sadly wanted.

In the meantime the war is our daily conversation. We follow the fortunes of the armies in the West and in the East, we study maps of the Dardenelles and hope Constantinople will see wisdom and spare itself a bombardment. But above all, we await the speedy conclusion of the insane drama. Of the Jews in the army of Field Marshal Sir John French we get excellent accounts. One of our co-religionists, the late Lieutenant Frank Alexander de Pass, had the Victoria Cross conferred upon him. The words from the Official Gazette, recording the season for this signal honor, speak for themselves; the action they chronicle must move Jew and Gentile alike. Here they are: "For subsequently rescuing, under heavy fire, a wounded man who was lying exposed in the open." The D. S. O. (Distinguished Service Order) has been conferred on Captain C. J. Elkan. And our Jewish Chaplain at the front, the Rev. Michael Adler has just come back from France, where, he is convinced, there are more Jews serving than was thought to be the case. Ten thousand was the first estimate, but Mr. Adler thinks there must be considerably more. On his field cap Mr. Adler wore a badge which is unique in the army—the Mogen Dovid—and as Jewish soldiers recognized it, they made themselves known to him. But numerous as Jews are in the army, it would seem that they have no great desire to serve in a unit by themselves. The proposed Jewish battalion, of which we wrote a month or two ago, has come to nought, and now a committee has been formed incorporating those who were working for the Jewish battalion, for the purpose of encouraging recruiting for all units of the army. It is composed of gentlemen in close touch with the young men of our community, and is likely to be more successful than the first committee.

So far as making preparations for the great day of peace is concerned, the Conjoint Committee hold the field here. Unsatisfactory as it is, that body has to a certain extent assuaged the prevailing dissatisfaction by promising to consider all views. It would be a fine thing to have one front, one authority, one center, to present the Jewish case; and if the Conjoint Committee is wise, it would itself be that one authority. But it must rid itself of the attitude of the feudal overlord; it must act in the spirit of co-operation. In the multitude of counsellors there is safety. Most people in Anglo-Jewry hope that we shall have just that genus of safety. In the meantime work is being done. We all want to be helpful. We want to be quite sure that the occasion will be properly used.

The March meeting of the London Lodge was a well attended gathering and it is good to be able to report that some half dozen new members were admitted into our ranks. Probably the next initiation ceremony will be unique for the number of initiates. All this is for the good. Our hostel continues to shelter the little band of Belgian refugees, and our brethren in America may be glad to know that in a good many instances they are beginning to earn something. We hope that before long they may be self-supporting. The students are continuing their work at the colleges of the University of London, and the authorities have been most considerate to them. They pay no fees; and the same treatment is meted out to the children of Belgian refugees in the city schools. But while hospitality is good, their hope nevertheless is that they may soon return to their homes in peace. The whole world must surely hope this with them.

THE LEO M. FRANK CASE.

Judge Nathaniel E. Harris, governor-elect of Georgia, who will be inducted into office on the first of May, stopping in New York recently was interviewed regarding the Frank case.

"The Supreme Court," he said, "will not be through with the case until some days after I take office, and it is quite possible that I may never be asked to pardon Frank. I am not crossing any bridges before I come to them, and cannot say as yet, of course, what action I should take if I should be so asked.

"The State of Georgia is rather divided in opinion on the merits of the Frank case. The first bitterness against Frank has largely passed away, and there are now many who take the view that his conviction was a miscarriage of justice. On the other hand, there are plenty of them who do not. I have received a great many letters from all over the country since I was elected, and a good many of them were from New York, asking me to pardon Frank.

"Well, it's as bad as deciding a law suit, for the way public opinion stands at present I'll incur the displeasure of a good many people whether I do or I don't. Yes, that removes the danger of too great pressure one way or another from public opinion and makes it less dangerous for me to make any decision I may have to make on the merits of the case."

BEAT THE JEWS.

Nietchevo dielat poidem Zshidov bit—there is nothing to be done, let us go beat the Jews—is the watchword of the Black Hundreds, Archangel Gabriel and other anti-Semitic brotherhoods in Russia, the strongest supporters of Czar Nicolas, who at present is busy waging war for the furtherance of civilization in Germany. This policy took root in England, hence the Cecil Chestertons, the Hilarie Bellocs and the Grahams and other of their ilk; it also took root in our own country, hence the New York "Sun" and others of the same unkind kind. Even the Philadelphia "Public Ledger" could not withstand the temptation and has enrolled itself in the brotherhood of the anti-Semites. It is the fashion of the moment and why should it not follow suit? In a recent issue inspired by a Christian civilization which equals anti-Semitic propensity, it published the following:

"Our lack of a treaty with Russia, largely due to the oversensitiveness of a group of wealthy naturalized American citizens, and the short-sightedness of a Congress that extinguished our treaty relations with the Czar's government, acts as an unfortunate bar to a satisfactory and permanent extension of our trade there."

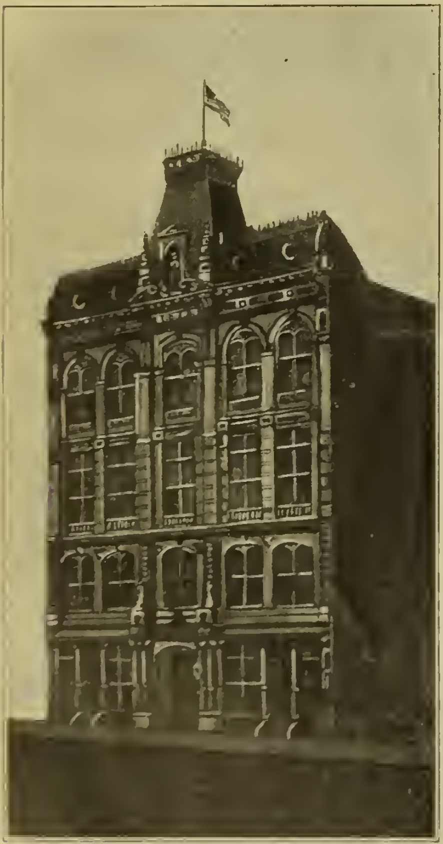
We must give credit to the writer of the above diatribe and recognize his great ability to cramp so many falsehoods in a few lines. While he ascribed the cause of the abrogation of the Russian treaty to the "wealthy naturalized American citizens" (meaning the American Jews) he did not mention the protests against Russia's trampling upon the honor and dignity of our country and our great seal, made by tens of thousands of laymen and clergymen of all denominations. He even forgot to hint at the fact that the abrogation passed the House by 301 votes to one and passed the Senate unanimously. This omission proves the writer's commercialized spirit, who for the almighty dollar would sell the honor and dignity of his country. It is not a new phase before us; all the anti-Semites are made of the same material. We do not complain. We are used to them. God Almighty must have all kinds of beasts in his menagerie, anti-Semites included. We do not despair. God that has saved us from all evil machinations of our enemies proclaims even now as in the olden times, "They shall not hurt nor destroy (Israel) in my holy mountain."—"Jewish Tribune."

Where the Convention Will Meet

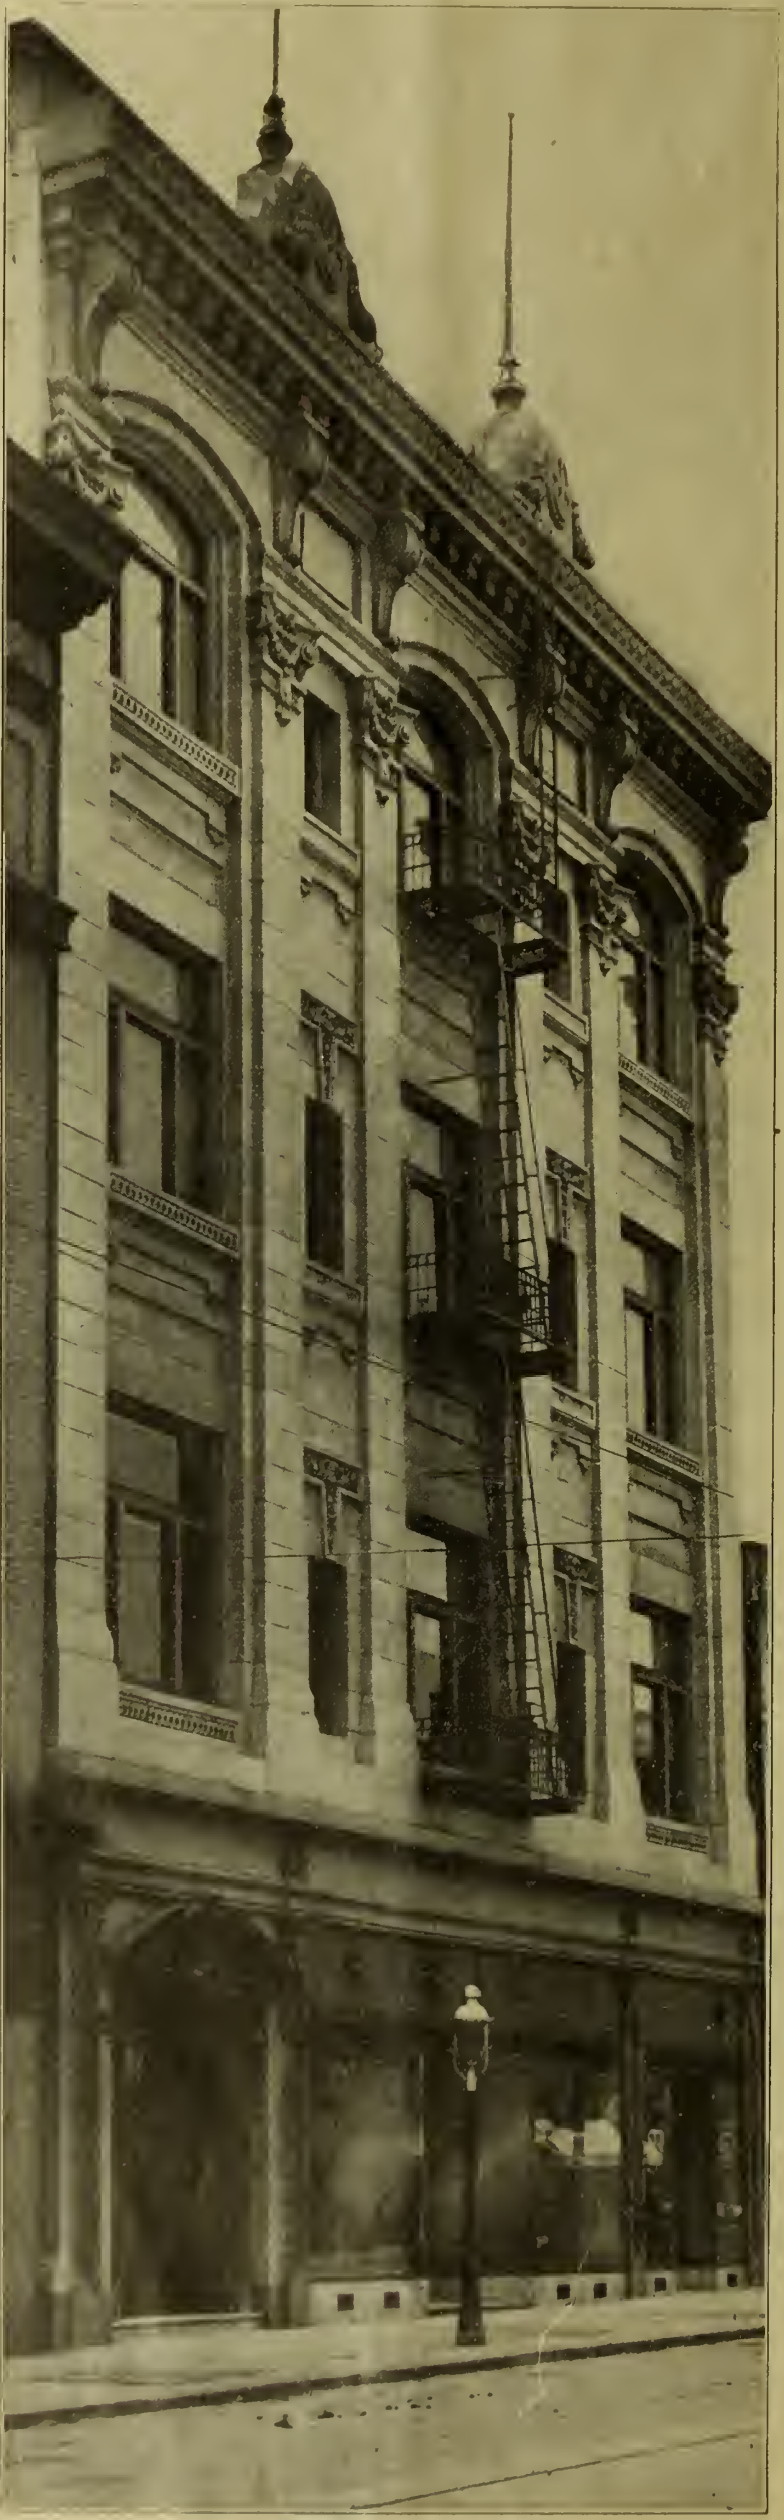
By I. J. ASCHHEIM
San Francisco, California

The Tenth General Convention of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith will open on Sunday morning, May 2, 1915, at the Civic Auditorium, located in the Civic Center, continue in session in that building during the afternoon and conclude with a public meeting in the evening, in a more spacious hall in the same edifice. After that the convention will hold its sessions in the B'nai B'rith building, 149 Eddy street. The former structure was erected by the Exposition Corporation and presented to the City of San Francisco as a monument to the indomitable spirit of the metropolis of the Pacific Coast, that would not be crushed even by the cataclysm of 1906.

The B'nai B'rith building stands upon historic B'nai B'rith ground and typifies the ardor and zeal of the Brotherhood of District No. 4 of the present day, but more especially of those of the by-gone generation. It was on this spot that the pioneers of the District built the first B'nai B'rith home in the world. The corner stone to the building was laid in 1878. It at once became the center of Pacific Coast B'nai B'rith activities and remained such until it went down in the great conflagration. During those years it was not only the home of the ten San Francisco lodges, which held their meetings weekly, but it also housed a library of some 13,000 volumes containing some of the choicest Jewish works in Hebrew, German and English which issued from the press. The library was supported by the Grand Lodge at an annual expense of between $2,000.00 and $2,500.00, and was open daily for the circulation of books. Until the municipality opened its branch libraries scores of children could be seen every day, in a room, fitted out for that purpose, doing their school work. When in 1890 the Grand Lodge established a free religious school, its classes were held in the building every Saturday and Sunday for years, and they occupied every one of the six lodge rooms until, for reasons which need not here be dwelt upon, the school was turned over to an organization, especially incorporated for that purpose, and removed to a part of the city then beginning to be the center of the in-flocking immigrants. The old B'nai B'rith hall was a veritable business hive. Each evening there could be seen, besides a line of library patrons, meetings of all descriptions and of varied import. The feature which made old "B. B. Hall" a conspicuous landmark in San Francisco was its auditorium, the scene of innumerable political battles. Many municipal conventions of note were held within its walls and during a Presidential or Gubernatorial campaign mass meetings were conducted there almost nightly. In the first years of its existence this auditorium was used to a great extent by the [illegible] of the city for their social functions, but that took a change when the fashionable hotels began to cater to them



The Old B'nai B'rith Hall.



The New B'nai B'rith Hall.

The property was managed by a board of hall directors and was erected from the proceeds of the sale of hall association stock, the lodges of San Francisco and vicinity and the Grand Lodge being the sole purchasers. The investment proved immediately a profitable one and it can be said that the dividends derived from it were the means of sustaining the lodges with their heavy sick benefit obligations during a period of at least twenty years, and, in a great measure of maintaining the endowment at the time when the old leaders were intoxicated with the notion that they had solved the problem and consequently increased the beneficiary certificates from $1,000.00 to $2,000.00. The rapid income that came to the Grand Lodge through this investment enabled it to purchase another piece of valuable property which it held until precisely a week before the fire, when by some fortuitous as well as fortunate circumstance it was sold at an enhanced figure sufficiently large to enable the Grand Lodge to erect the present structure in 1910.

The present B'nai B'rith building, like some would-be patricians, is good to look at and all right in every respect, but has no history; for the old timers it still lacks that indefinable something which the old hall had, but then I presume the young generation will in time supply that atmosphere for their own enjoyment. We have six lodge rooms, headquarters for the Grand Lodge, including library and board room, a fair-sized assembly room, in which the convention will meet, a full-fledged and well equipped gymnasium, and three good-sized stores. The delegates are especially invited to inspect "Covenant Hall," arranged for B'nai B'rith degree work. It is in many respects very unique and perhaps the most richly furnished B'nai B'rith lodge room in America. The owners of the property are the four hundred and odd endowment members who were in good standing at the time the Grand Lodge liquidated that branch of its system and divided the Hall Association stock among them. The Grand Lodge, however, has leased the building for a period of five years and is operating it as a trust for the shareholders until there is a substantial revival in the real estate market of this city.

STAGE JEWS.

Mr. Horace Fuller, leading dramatic writer, reviewing the work of David Warfield in "The Auctioneer," said in part:

"Is it not curious what changes time brings? Some of us can remember Mr. Warfield when with Weber and Fields' burlesque show he used to caricature the Jew. He appeared before us with enormous false feet and did his best to ridicule the race to which he has the honor to belong. Since that time he has passed from the age of buffoonery to the age of real artistry and under the management of Mr. Belasco, a clever manager and producer of his own race, he has come to the point where he portrays for us the Jew as he really is; the Jew as a man; full of faults as the men of all races are, but showing us also that the Jew is intensely human, wonderfully sympathetic; long-suffered uncomplaining; a faithful father, a loving husband—very much a man!

"In some respects," indeed, the Simon Levi of "The Auctioneer" is a modern Shylock; the same plea that Shakespeare's Jew makes, Simon Levi makes, and by so much the play has a right to be regarded as one of the classics. It answers in some regards, the questions asked by Shylock: 'Hath not a Jew eyes?' and the rest, and it shows us, as few plays in modern times have done, how vitally the Jew has entered into the social life of America and, also, how much in the way of humanity and charity and other fine qualities the Gentiles of America owe the Jew of today.

"There is no use going into the details of the story told in "The Auctioneer"; it has been told again and again, and most of us know it. What matters it that it shows us, with marked fidelity to detail, the life of an American Jew, one who has begun the struggle for life on our continent in starvation and wretchedness, and who, by thrift and shrewdness, has won his way, as so many Jews that we all know have done, up to affluence and a position in society?

"Had it not been for "The Auctioneer" it is highly probable that such distinctively Jewish plays as "The Children of the Ghetto," "The Melting Pot," and even "Potash and Perlmutter" might never have been written. It is not too much to say that such a play as this deserves to take its rank with the epoch-making literature of its time, for, by faithfully portraying the Jew it must exert such an influence that will in time cause all the vaudeville caricatures of the Jew's worst aspects to cease, and thus we shall all come to have a saner and clearer understanding of a people who already dominate our financial and commercial world and who have the American theater firmly within its grasp."

The Jewish Orphan Asylum

OF CLEVELAND, OHIO

The Jewish Orphan Asylum of District Grand Lodges Nos. 2 and 6, located at Cleveland, Ohio, was opened on September 29, 1868, with an enrollment of twenty-eight children. During the forty-six years of its existence, it has harbored within its walls 3,277 orphans; has discharged 2,775; and lost by death 33, a little more than 1 per cent. The present number of pupils is 502, consisting of 280 boys and 222 girls. Throughout its career, the Jewish Orphan Asylum has been fortunate in its directorate and in the men entrusted with the actual administration. The former has always been composed of men and women of national reputation, intensely interested in the cause of the child. Presided over successively by Messrs. Abraham Aub, Abraham Wiener, Abraham Hart, David Adler, William Stix and Louis S. Levi, the trustees and directors of the Jewish Orphan Asylum ever seconded the efforts of the men whom they had called to administer the affairs of the home. L. Aufrecht was the first superintendent. To him was given the task of organizing the institution, and during ten years of service, he brought to his work fine originality and great sincerity of purpose. He was succeeded by Dr. S. Wolfenstein, who remained at the head of the home from September, 1878, to November 1, 1913. During the thirty-five years of blessed activity, he infused into the home the spirit which has borne such splendid fruit and which has elevated it to an exalted position among child-caring institutions. It was his genius which, supported by a corps of loyal workers, brought out the best in the children entrusted to his care and prepared them so well for life that the graduates of the Jewish Orphan Asylum scattered throughout the country and following almost every kind of profession may point with but few exceptions to position won, to success achieved. Dr. S. Wolfenstein retired from the work on November 1, 1913, and was succeeded in the position by his assistant, Simon Peiser. The enviable reputation the Jewish Orphan Asylum enjoys, imposes upon its board and superintendent the grave responsibility of sustaining the high position it occupies. To accomplish this successfully, the home needs larger quarters and greater facilities. Initial steps have already been taken by the members of the board towards the realization of a new, spacious home, erected upon broad acres, and it is the fond hope of every one interested in the welfare of the Jewish Orphan Asylum that with the loyal aid of the lodges throughout the districts and with the generous support of the Jewish communities, the oldest child of our Order will be enabled to maintain its enviable rank among child-caring institutions.

The History of the B'nai B'rith Building

LOS ANGELES, CALIFORNIA

By Mr. W. W. Bearman :: :: :: Los Angeles, California

The beautiful structure in which Los Angeles Lodge No. 487 holds its meetings and under which roof congregate regularly a zealous body of representative Jews working for the good of the Order, was erected during the early part of 1910, that year being the year that Brother Emanuel Cohen presided over the destinies of the lodge. Up to that time the lodge had occupied rented quarters for many years and the years preceding the erection of the building were trying years wherein many difficulties were met and overcome. After a great deal of planning and dreaming the lodge entered into a realization of its dreams for a home of its own by purchasing on Seventeenth Street a lot for $4,080.00.

It should be noted here, that in keeping with the rise of real estate values, this lot now has a market value of $8,400.00. The imposing lodge room that now adorns this lot was erected at that time at a cost of $8,500.00. The investment at the present time it will be seen, represents a value of approximately $16,900.OO, and as there is an encumbrance of $5,500.00 on the property which is being reduced each year, the lodge feels that it has accomplished one thing that it set out to do. Plans are being worked out at the present time, which if successfully carried out, will mean that Los Angeles Lodge will in the very near future, own this property free and clear of any encumbrances.

At the time the building was erected, the lodge had $2,500.00 in its treasury. Large balances are not kept in the bank now, as all the money that can possibly be spared is applied to reduce this and other indebtedness of the lodge.

The writer of these few lines, although not claiming to be a Seer, but realizing the actual growth of Los Angeles Lodge, and looking just a step forward, begs to submit as his humble opinion that in the next three years the lodge will have outgrown these quarters and we will have to meet the needs of a much larger Jewish community and of an active working membership of at least 1,000 of our coreligionists.

Let us, as the prophets have said, "Be strong and of good courage" and "by working and watching" achieve our ends.

"OUR PRIDE"

The Home for Aged and Infirm of District No. 1

Our institution situated in the city of Yonkers, N. Y., is shown below, not in all its splendor, but from the picture thus presented you can imagine its beauty, when its rolling lawns, its magnificent trees, its arbors covered with growing, flowering vines assume their summer garb,—a scene which beggars description. A spot ideal, a home, indeed, standing out majestically, one might say, on a hill overlooking the Hudson river, the "Rhine of America," it gives to our brothers, their wives and ofttimes their widows, a private garden of 9¼ acres in which to pass in peace and quiet, surrounded with all comfort, the balance of the span of life allotted to

Home for Aged and Infirm, Yonkers, N. Y.

Married Couple's Room

And lastly see those smiling faces, showing clearly how well our sentiments are founded and demonstrating the joy of those who in their old age have found a "Home" worthy of its name.

Synagogue

Our Home for Aged and Infirm found its inspiration in the minds and hearts of those loyal souls whose memory we revere as founders of our beloved Order. Back in the dim past, in 1857, a general fund was created by the contribution of $1.00 per annum to effectually carry out what is best described in the charter granted the B'nai B'rith Benevolent Society in 1859.

"To establish an institution for the support, care and maintenance of persons, who, by reason of old age, sickness, or other infirmities, are unable to provide for themselves and also a home for poor widows."

Again in 1878:

"To provide edifice or edifices in which members of the Independent Order B'nai B'rith or any of their families, who thorough protracted illness, old age or extraordinary occurrences, have become unable to gain a livelihood."

It is justly termed "The Pride of the District," for it has lightened the load and brightened the road of those of its members who through stress of circumstances found it necessary to enter its doors.

A Ward in the Hospital

A few statistics and we have told our story. Dedicated on July 5, 1881, it has sheltered to date 390 inmates, the oldest of whom at present is 92 years, the youngest but 49, and it is interesting to know that it gave shelter to one brother for over 30 years.

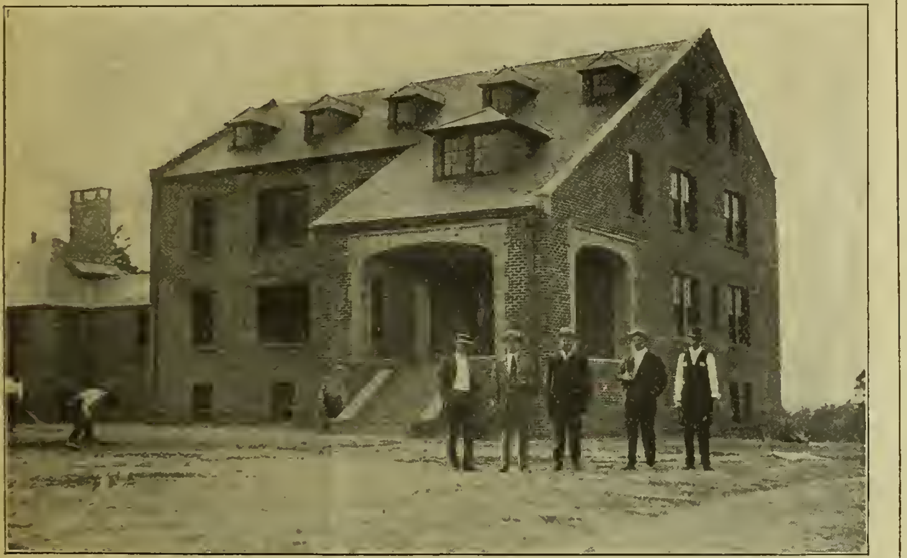
For its maintenance there has been expended over $540,000.00 of which the District has contributed more than $480,000.00, the balance being supplied by donations, etc. This does not take into account the monies gathered and so generously devoted to the work by that band of willing workers, the Ladies' Auxiliary Society, who supplied the linen and other household necessities.

A Brother's Living Room

Group of Residents of the Home

The Erie Orphanage

By RABBI MAX J. CURRICK, Erie, Pa.



At about this time the twenty-four children of the B'nai B'rith Orphanage and Home for Friendless Children of District No. 3, are moving from the temporary home in which they have lived since July 4, 1912, to their beautiful cottages in Erie county, about fourteen miles from the city of the same name. They are entering a home which for convenience, beauty and comfort cannot be equaled by that of the average child who considers himself much more fortunately placed than these wards of our district. Beautifully situated on a tract of ninety-five acres of high ground, presented to the district by the Jewish people of Erie, there are two cottages, each with a capacity of thirty children. The buildings are in every way modern, the style, finish and furnishings making them by all odds the finest homes in the entire county outside of the city. This does not mean that they have been extravagantly built, but merely that those facilities and house equipments which have hitherto been looked upon as typical of city homes have not been omitted. Running water, electric light, steam heat, modern plumbing, shower baths and numbers of other things that are not ordinarily seen in farm or country houses have all been successfully installed so that everything making for healthful and happy living, so far as material things are concerned, has been provided.

But, of course, these material things are intended to minister to the moral and spiritual. And any one meeting the children of our home will at once recognize the atmosphere as that of a splendid and real home, anything but that of an institution. The children are enabled to lead a normal home life. Their individuality is not suppressed nor confined in the old-fashioned institutional ruts which used to mar the personality of children in the orphan asylums built and conducted on the congregate plan. They meet strangers who come to the home in a friendly, hospitable manner and lack the timidity and backwardness that so often comes with institutionalism. They have the benefits of the free out-of-doors life, and will also acquire that knowledge of nature and agriculture which is the heritage of Americans who came from the farm. They feel thoroughly at home, a feeling that is strengthened by the relations existing between them and the matron, Miss Nettie Eichenbaum. For the matron is really the mother to all of them, takes a motherly interest in their lives, and maintains in the home such intercourse as more fortunate children enjoy with their parents. The change that is noticeable in all of the children soon after their admission is remarkable testimony to the beneficence of the method. Poorly nourished when they come in, as most of them are, they are soon transformed into ruddy youngsters the sight of whom is a pleasure to the onlooker; the vices and weaknesses of city life are soon eradicated in the fine environment of a typical country home. The children, many of whom attended school irregularly before coming to our home, and had poor and indifferent records, rapidly forge forward to the first places in their classes and win prizes offered for special merit. As a class our children are considered far and away the best children in the district school. The short term of the district school is not, however, considered adequate for the education of our children and the board of governors therefore engages the services of a teacher for several hours each day during the first two months of the vacation. This advantage our children are entitled to, inasmuch as the majority of them will find their careers in the cities and will have to cope with children who have had the advantages of city schools. And their training on the farm, in addition, is something which the average city child misses as long as he lives.

Thus our children are leading the normal American life. They are absorbing the independent American spirit of initiative, self-reliance and industry. They have each their own banking account into which they are encouraged to put whatever savings they are able to accumulate. In the cases of the two boys who have been Bar Mitzvah this amounts to a respectable sum inasmuch as the good people of Erie have established the precedent of increasing their banking accounts on such occasions by generous gifts. This leads to the point that the life, though typically American, is also thoroughly Jewish. The governors have in mind the religious convictions of the parents of these children and in consideration thereof the regimen of the home and the customs are all orthodox. It is not easy to maintain a strictly kosher home far removed from the city, but it is done nevertheless. The matron observes the holidays after the traditional Jewish manner and thus the life of the home itself is an important part of the religious education of the child. The governors are now trying to secure the services of a competent person to assist the matron in Hebrew and religious instruction. Nothing that will add to the service rendered by the home to the children will be omitted, funds permitting.

The buildings of the home are situated on the Ridge Road about fourteen miles west of Erie. They are therefore accessible both by suburban trolley which passes right before the grounds and by automobile. The plans call for three cottages in one group with a central kitchen, though the cottages have separate pantries and dining rooms. The plan is very much on the order of the orphanage at Pleasantville, New York, with the exception of the kitchens. At Pleasantville they have found the separate kitchens rather expensive, and our plan is designed to cut down the expense without lessening the individuality and independence of the life of each cottage. Two buildings and a kitchen are now completed, with the exception of the installation of electric current. This is now being done and wires are being strung from the municipal plant of Girard and by the time this article is being read the task will no doubt have been completed and the buildings occupied by our children. Many serious problems have been encountered since work was started on the new buildings on September 30, 1913, but all of them have been satisfactorily solved or are on the way to a satisfactory solution. The Board of Directors have earned the gratitude of the district because of their untiring diligence and conscientious effort in bringing these buildings to the highest point of efficiency and usefulness. They hold the title to the buildings for the District Grand Lodge and also have possession of whatever endowments accrue to the home.

The home is conducted by a Board of Governors, chosen by the supporters of the home. These are selected from all parts of the four states comprising District No. 3, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware and West Virginia; they are elected by a vote taken by mail in which all the lodges and individual contributors to the home participate.

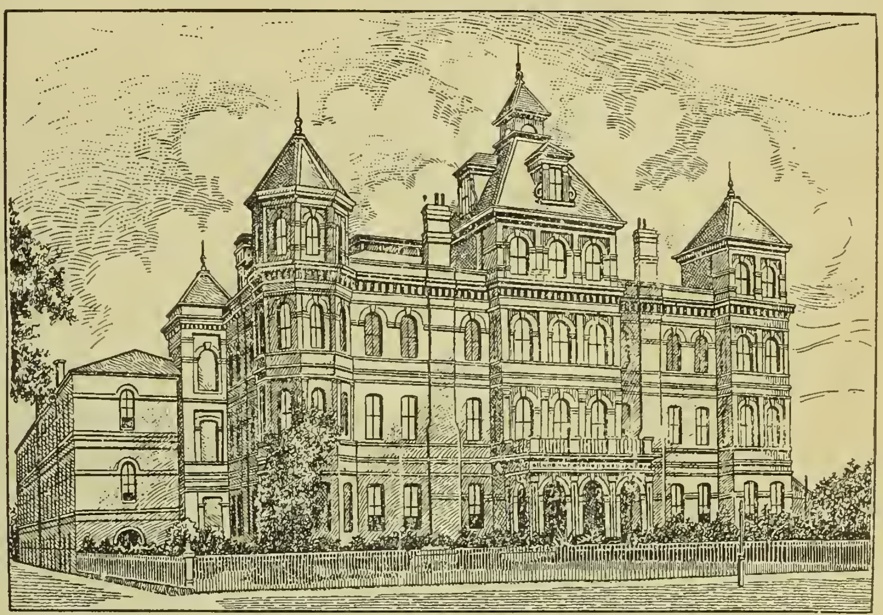
The members from Erie form what is known as the local board. They conduct the affairs of the home between the quarterly meetings of the Board of Governors. The officers of the Board of Governors are the following: President, Isador Sobel, Erie; Vice President, Max Rothschild, Pittsburgh; Secretary, Mrs. E. P. Marks, Erie; Treasurer, Isador Simon, Erie. The officers of the Board of Directors are: President, Morris Schaffner, Erie; Vice President, Marcus Feuchtwanger, New Castle; Secretary, Isaac Baker, Erie; Treasurer, Isador Simon, Erie.

The Erie home has certainly put new life into District No. 3. From the day in 1910 that the convention in Pittsburgh adopted the report of the committee favoring the establishment of a home for orphaned and friendless children in the district there has been manifest a quickening of the activity of the district. The interest in the home is sure to increase. Even such cities as have their own institutions, like Pittsburgh, Philadelphia and Newark, are showing a commendable interest in the Erie home and they will no doubt do their full share towards raising funds to liquidate the debt for the magnificent new buildings. The good which is being done for the children will without doubt react upon the entire district. Notable progress has been made in the two short years of the existence of the home. The story of the succeeding years will surely afford even greater satisfaction because then we shall be enabled to see some of the fruit of the labor of our hands. District No. 3 will be justified in aligning itself proudly with its sisters of the B.B. that are doing useful work. And all the more will this pride be justified since every intelligent effort is being made to have the Erie home the very last word in homes for orphan and friendless children.

Jewish Widows' and Orphans' Home

And the Connection of District Grand Lodge No. 7 With Same

By MR. NAT. STRAUSS - - - New Orleans, La.



The two fatal epidemics of 1847 and 1853 left in their train a number of widows and orphans, who for several years were supported by the Benevolent Association of New Orleans. There were at that time scarcely two thousand Jewish souls in this city, and very few who could have been considered rich men. This support proved insufficient, and if continued would have wrecked the charitable societies.

In 1855 a number of the most influential Jews called a meeting in order to devise a plan for the care and protection of these unfortunates. A new society was organized under the name of "The Association for the Relief of Jewish Widows and Orphans," and, although many difficulties presented themselves, steps were taken immediately to build an asylum, and in January, 1856, the home, on the corner of Jackson Avenue and Chippewa Street, was dedicated. With utmost liberality on the part of the founders, the following preamble was adopted:

"The object of the corporation shall be to establish a home or asylum to receive under its care the support of indigent Hebrew widows; also to receive, foster, provide for, maintain and instruct Jewish orphans and half orphans of both sex."

From the very start the doors were open to the children of the district. For twenty years this concession obtained. At the end of this period the children of the district largely outnumbered those of the city, and, in appreciation of the generosity extended to us by the managers of the home, upon the petition of District Grand Lodge No. 7, a contract was entered into by levying a per capita assessment of $2 annually in support of the institution.

This contract continued until the separation of the District from the Cleveland Orphan Asylum, to which up to that date a similar assessment was paid, and the whole amount of $4 was voted to the New Orleans asylum.

In the course of years, it became manifest, in view of the increasing demands, that our home had to be enlarged. In October, 1884, a special committee was appointed by the board to take this matter under consideration. At a special meeting in 1885, a resolution was adopted empowering the president to purchase a lot at a cost of $8,500 at the corner of St. Charles and Peters Avenues, for the purpose of erecting a new home at a cost of $60,000.

Through the efforts of Drs. Gutheim and I. L. Leucht, assisted by Drs. Voorsanger, Berkowitz, Hecht, Eisenthal, Stoltz, Weiss and Leventhal, the amount subscribed for the building fund reached $43,000.

On November 25, being Thanksgiving Day, the corner stone was laid by the Grand Lodge of Masons of Louisiana. Our lamented leader, Brother Leo N. Levi was the orator of the day.

Dr. I. L. Leucht, chairman of the committee, turning to the Grand Master, said:

"I beg of you and your noble band of men to consecrate the corner stone of our new home to the God of all mankind. You belong to an order teaching that every man may become a Master Mason, worthy to help in building that grand temple of humanity, wherein resounds from pole to pole, the unity of Jehova.

"No walls are erected dividing the hearts of men, where unity, love and charity sing Hosanna in unbroken harmony. Pour out your wine and oil on this corner stone, let the future home to be reared upon it be called 'Bethel,' and join us in the prayer of our Patriarch, Jacob: 'And this stone, which I have set for a pillar, shall be God's House, and all which thou dost give me, I will surely give a tenth part to thee.' May such be His holy will. Amen!"

The education of our children is provided for in the Isidore Newman Manual Training School. This school bears the name of the noble donor who at a cost of over $75,000 erected this institution. There are other features connected with the management worth mentioning, namely:

The Henry Newman Education Fund, out of the interest of which assistance is rendered to worthy students to pursue a chosen profession.

The Simon Gumbel Dower Fund of $10,000, out of the interest of which is provided a dower to girls raised in our home.

The Jewish Widows' and Orphans' Home is one of the three institutions fostered by our district.

At the last meeting of the Grand Lodge. instead of the per capita already alluded to, a resolution was adopted fixing the per capita dues for the support of our institution at $1.50 per quarter, and a flat appropriation was voted it for the Jewish Widows' and Orphans' Home $20,000, for the Touro Infirmary $7,000, and for the Leo N. Levi Hospital $6,000.

The number in our home has been steadily increasing, and we are now housing under our roof, one hundred and seventy orphans.

THE LEO N. LEVI MEMORIAL HOSPITAL

By EMIL NATHAN, St. Louis, Mo.

"For the Cause That Needs Assistance For the Good That We Can Do."

The comparative ease with which the $100,000 Building Fund of the Leo N. Levi Memorial Hospital was raised has aroused considerable notice and some speculation.

The success attending the campaign to raise this large amount of money for a comparatively unknown cause owes much to the potential qualities of our Order.

Being a National Sanitarium, originated, built, and maintained by the I. O. B. B. for suffering humanity generally, the appeal for funds was taken up by a majority of the I. O. B. B. lodges, largely as a matter of deep, personal concern and interest.

Many lodges with small membership contributed generously to the fund, while other lodges of large membership gave but small amounts for the good cause.

It will be interesting to recount some of the peculiar experiences brought out by the effort to get together this large sum of money.

A refreshing note came from a very small lodge, early in the campaign, that a contribution of $500 would be made to the fund to name a room in memory of a distinguished past president of this lodge of twenty members. The same mail brought from a lodge of 250 members the munificent sum of $5.00.

Considering the size of the fund to which this $5 was intended as a contribution, the postage stamp from each member did not serve to immortalize the lodge for "transcendent generosity."

In sending a contribution of $1,000, a generous member apologized for the $100 subscribed by his lodge of great membership, and a lodge of thirty-two members graciously sent $8.00 and asked if a room could not be set aside for some of their indigent members.

These incidents will serve to illustrate the difference in opinion and ideas of giving away money for such purposes as the I. O. B. B. Sanitarium represents.

It may be said that the raising of this fund of money proves in a most positive manner the pure democracy of the I. O. B. B. membership.

Aside from a few large contributions, amounts from 50c to $100 made up the greater part of the sum raised.

The members of the Board of Trustees [illegible] an aggregate of about $5,000 [illegible] distinguished members of the order contributed $100 each to the Life Membership feature offered by the Association.

The Sanitarium opened its doors on Nov. 1, 1914, and is being run in a most satisfactory manner.

While only about a third of our beds are being used, the service performed is. beyond question, of great benefit to our suffering dependents.

Having no pay wards and desiring none to be added, the usefulness of the Institution can be extended to the capacity of its beds, only, by generous subscriptions of the various branches of the order to the Maintenance Fund.

It is generally admitted that the Sanitarium performs a great and lasting service to humanity and through its broad field of usefulness, our order will receive that credit, for which it has good reason to be proud.

The progress of our work at Hot Springs is best evidenced by the expression of a member of the local board, in a recent letter, whose connection with the Hot Springs Committee of the I. O. B. B. for the past twelve years has been distinguished for constant personal service and unselfish interest:

"We are gradually getting the Hospital into smooth systematic order, and I feel a great pride in our Institution.

"We are making a reputation for efficiency. We are getting results. Some of our cures are remarkable.

"We are doing so well that we are besieged by people with money who want to get in and pay.

"We have a fine medical staff and our Board of Managers work in perfect harmony with them.

"We are after results (and are getting them).

"I feel that our efforts are amply repaid by the results thus far achieved.

"We see some awful cases of unfortunate poor, and sick, cripples leave us restored to health and some of the emergency cases owe their lives to our noble little Institution.

"I know that we are destined to do a great, good, and noble work. I feel that our labor and magnificent accomplishment will result in thousands of deserving unfortunates, getting their chance to come back again to a life of usefulness, instead of helplessness."

ALLIANCE SCHOOLS IN TURKEY AND PALESTINE.

It is reported that all the schools under the management of the Alliance Israelite Universal in Turkey, and even those in Palestine and Syria, are continuing their work fairly satisfactorily. The many expulsions of non-Ottoman Jews from Palestine have not appreciably affected the situation of the schools. As a matter of fact, in some localities the number of pupils has largely increased owing to the closing of French Christian schools which were attended by Jewish children.

RUSSIAN PREMIER AND POLISH JEWS.

The Premier, M. Goremykin, received a Jewish deputation which consisted of Deputy Freedman, Advocate Grusenberg, and the Warsaw communal worker, M. Davidson. The deputation acquainted the Premier with the position of the Jews in the Polish war zone. M. Goremykin listened to their statements with marked attention, expressed his sympathy with the suffering Jews, and promised to render all assistance possible.

More interesting are his exegetical remarks. Though they follow the traditional lines, and especially those of his father, who was an excellent punster, they reflect very often the spirit of the times. Thus he says once, in explanation of the passage of the Psalms: "The law of the Lord is perfect restoreth the soul." "If the law of the Lord would only restore the body, then it would not be eternal, because inasmuch as the body is perishable, so the means of keeping the body must also be perishable, but inasmuch as the Torah restoreth the soul, as the soul is immortal, so the law of the Lord must also be perpetual, and this is a proof that the Psalmist denounced all attempts at even the slightest change and departure from ancient tradition, a proof that the law of God is unchangeable. On the basis of this principle we understand a difficult Talmudic passage. The Talmud says: what is meant by the words of Jeremiah, 9:12: "They have forsaken my law; they did not say the first blessing before the reading of the Torah." This indeed difficult passage, Samuel Wolf Schreiber interprets in his own way. He says, "We have two benedictions, one preceding the reading of the Torah, and one following it. In the one preceding the reading of the Torah, we offer thanks to God for having selected us from all nations, and given us his Torah. This is merely a historical fact. In the blessing, following the reading of the Torah, we offer thanks to God who has given us the law of truth, and implanted in us life eternal. By this we acknowledge not merely the historic fact that the Torah has been given to us, but also the dogmatic truth that this Torah is eternal. Those who have forsaken God's law are therefore those who will not even admit the divine origin of the Torah, but infidels are also those, who, admitting the divine origin of the Torah, will claim that this Torah may be changed.

It was only consistent for a man holding such principles that he opposed the "Congress," called in 1868, and all attempts at modernizing the position of the Jews. Part of the latter was the establishment of a rabbinical seminary, which finally in spite of all opposition, became a fact in 1877. Samuel Wolf did not live long enough to see this terrible blow upon traditional Judaism become a reality. He died December 31, 1871, at the age of fifty-six, and at once a legend was started, which was published by his son, Solomon. It was said that when Samuel Wolf was six years old, he was very sick, and the physician, having given up all hope, informed the father, and said, "Rabbi, now it is your turn, we can do nothing else." Then the rabbi turned in prayer towards the shrine, where he preserved his manuscripts, and after having poured out his heart, turned to the people present, saying, "I have prayed him out for a 'Jobel'" (half a century). It is needless to say that Rabbi Moses Sofer was not guilty of such a blasphemy. It, therefore, is also unnecessary to expressly deny another story connected with the birth of this son. It is said at the time of the birth of Samuel Wolf, the mother was in a very critical condition, and people turned to the rabbi, asking him why he did not try to shorten her pain by prayer. He replied that he would consider this wrong because the Talmud (Yoma, 38, b; Gen. Rabba, 50, ed. Theodor, p. 619), says no Zaddik dies before another Zaddik is born, and knowing that the child which is about to be born will be a Zaddik, I would, if I prayed for the shortening of my wife's pain, hasten the death of another Zaddik, which I cannot conscientiously do. A similar story, against which no one would have more vigorously protested than Rabbi Moses himself, is the report that, when he traveled with his teacher, Nathan Adler, from Boskowitz to Vienna, they experienced the miracle, which according to the Midrash, was accorded to Jacob, the distance became miraculously short. As an instance how such miracles are created, another case may be quoted. It has been repeatedly told that in 1804, when the French occupied Pressburg, a few Jewish soldiers of the Austrian army, crossed the river, in order to attend services on the Ninth of Ab, in the city. Having left without furlough, they were arrested upon their return, and charged with being spies. The rabbi heard of this story, and being old and weak from fasting, he sent his sexton to Arch Duke Karl, telling him that if he would pardon these men, who are actually innocent, the victory would follow his flag. The Archduke consented, and he won a great victory. The story is made furthermore interesting by the addition that at the same time the rabbi spoke a word in favor of a few Christian soldiers, who also were innocently charged with treason. The story, however, has many holes. In 1804 there was no war which could have brought the French army to or near Pressburg. Furthermore, Moses Sofer did not come to Pressburg until 1806, and finally, even if the story should have happened in 1809, when there was war between Austria and France, the French troops were not near Pressburg, and the war was terminated before the Ninth of Ab. Finally, even in 1809, Moses Sofer was but forty-six years of age. He had married late in life, and had no children, with his first wife. This again shows the inconsistency, even of so prominent an orthodox. The Talmud (Yebamos, 64, a), clearly states as an absolute law that a man should divorce his wife if he lived for ten years in childless marriage. Moses Sofer did not do it. He might have claimed in his defense that even in rabbinic literature an exception is permitted. The story is so beautiful, that it is worth while repeating it here. A couple married for ten years in childless wedlock, appealed to Rabbi Simeon B. Yohai for a divorce. The rabbi told them that he was willing to grant the divorce, but inasmuch as they had begun their married life with a feast, they should also end it with a feast. The couple, acting upon his advice, went home, and the wife prepared an excellent parting dinner. The husband partook of the wine so freely that he fell asleep. In this condition, the wife had him removed to the house of her parents. When he awoke the next morning, he asked where he was. Being told that he was at the home of his wife's parents, he became so touched by the experience of his wife's feeling, that he consented to withdraw his divorce suit. The rabbi prayed for them and they were blessed with children (Canticles Rabba, 1, 31). From a point of view of rabbinical law, this story should not have influenced Moses Sofer's action, because according to a conception of rabbinic theology, Hagadah does not have the force of a law, although in this as in many other occasions, it is exceedingly difficult to arrive at a definite conclusion in regard to rabbinic authority. When Rabbi Moses Sofer lost his first wife by death, he married again, and this time again a widow, the daughter of his colleague, Akiba Eger, then of Maerkisch Firedland, only one year his senior. The fruit of this marriage was Samuel Wolf, born March 1, 1915, on the same day which Isaac Hirsch Weiss was born, a representative of strictly opposite views of rabbinic studies. It is interesting to calculate again how accidents will play an important part in history. When Samuel Wolf was five years old, his father was elected rabbi of Fuerth. The leading Talmudist of this Congregation, Rabbi Wolf Hamburger, himself a rabbinical author of considerable repute, tried his best to persuade the famous man to accept the position. Had Moses Sofer accepted, the life of his son would undoubtedly have taken a different turn. He would, in all probability, have become a German orthodox of the modern type, much as Solomon Cohn, the grandson of the previous rabbi of Fuerth, Meshullam Zalman Kohen. Providence protected him from such a calamity. He became rabbi of Pressburg, and conducted the affairs of the Congregation in the style of the eighteenth century. By peculiar coincidence at the time when he entered the office just as at the time of his death, Hungary was right in the midst of a strong liberal movement. In 1840, Hungary, like most of the states of Western Europe, tried to become modernized, and part of the program was the improvement of the condition of the Jews. Part of this program again, was the appeal that the Jews become more educated in a secular sense. Similar was the condition in 1872, when a successor to Samuel Wolf was elected. In 1867 Hungary had won her independence from Austria's rule, and again entered into a period of liberalism, and again the question of the condition of the Jews came in prominently for discussion. The result was the calling of the "Congress" which was to decide on a proper representation of Judaism, with a view of Magyarizing them. Connected with this a state's institute for the training of rabbis should provide rabbis who would preach the language of the country, which up to that time was exceedingly rare. Samuel Wolf, as all the orthodox rabbis, opposed this movement. They, however, succeeded only in postponing the realization, for in 1877 this institution opened its doors. But Samuel Wolf was, to use the words of the Prophet, "taken away before the evil days had come to pass." His Congregation, however, in spite of the esteem in which he was held, intended to appoint a more modern man. Opinions were divided, and the orthodox by a clever coup, placed the Congregation before the accomplished fact. I have the following story from a man who lived in Pressburg at that time: The leader of Hungarian orthodoxy was one Itzig Reich. Before the rabbi was buried, he called the trustees together, and after short deliberation, they elected one of the six sons of the deceased, Simchah Bunem, officially called Brenard, as his father's successor. I was told that Itzig Reich went to the Beth Hamidrash, where the dead rabbi's body was, as we might say, lying in state, and removing the cover from the body, whispered into his ear, both in Hebrew and in Yiddish, "I have the extreme honor of informing you that your son, the great and learned Simchah Bunem, was elected your successor, Mazeltoff." To the bystanders he said that he could swear a holy oath that the rabbi smiled when he heard this message. The man who reported to me the story, smiled himself. The liberal element was provoked at this trick, and seceded, forming a small, and to this day, insignificant Congregation. The majority still holds the tradition of the great teacher Moses sacred to this day. Simchah Bunem naturally followed in his father's footsteps, and this was right away marked by adopting the traditional rabbinical costume, which is nothing else but the usual costume of the Polish Jews. I would account for this fact because from the seventeenth century on most of the rabbis, if not all, of the leading Congregations were imported from Poland, and so their costume became the official vestment of a rabbi. In the same way it may be taken as certain that the so-called Polish costume is nothing else but the costume of rich and prominent people, worn in Germany up to end of the fifteenth century, when the Polish Jews, emigrating from Germany, established themselves in their new home. Simchah Bunem had been, up to time of the unexpected death of his father, a business man in Vienna, attending the stock exchange, a "Boersenspekulant," as it is called there. As such, while an observant Jew, he dressed as any other gentleman would. He would go to a coffee house, sit there reading his paper, and having a chat just like other business men of his type. The story is reported, when as rabbi of Pressburg, a few years later, he visited Baden, a health resort near Vienna, one of his former acquaintances from the stock exchange met him, and seeing him wear the Polish costume, he exclaimed, with an expression of horror: "For God's sake, Schreiber, what did you do? How do you look!" A similar embarrassing scene occurred when the rabbi, who came, naturally, upon hearing the news of the death of his father, to Pressburg, received the visit of his wife, who followed him. One of his little boys came running into the room and said, "Papa!" It was a terrible thing, for naturally the son of a rabbi of Pressburg is not allowed to say "Papa," but must in orthodox style, say "Taate." Just as Rabbi Simchah Bunem himself, when in the course of his lecture, referring to his father, would say, "Der Taate, may I be an atonement for his rest." So the Talmud prescribes the formula to be recited during the first year, after a man's death, while subsequently, he adds, "Blessed be his memory!"

Simchah Bunem died at Frankfurt am Main, the original home of his family, December 2, 1906, having held his office for nearly thirty-four years. This is a remarkable case of even distribution in one family. The grandfather was rabbi of Pressburg for thirty-three years, the father for thirty-two years, and the son for thirty-four. Simchah Bunem had, however, retired from active duty a few years previously, having by and by become afflicted with some kind of mental disease, which is said to be hereditary in some branches of the family, as may be due to the one-sided occupation, or as some claim, to the fact that the stock became weakened by the fact that Moses Schreiber married late in life. It was certainly a peculiar coincidence that the grandson should return to the place from which his father had come originally. He was placed there in an orthodox sanitarium. Again, we see an interesting lesson in philosophy of history. If a certain movement outlives the time of severest opposition, it has a chance to survive. We might quote Catholicism as an example. In the sixteenth century, it seemed that the days of Catholicism were numbered. One country after another forsook the old church, and even in those countries like Spain and Poland, where the majority of the population remained faithful to the church, the reform movement grew. But after the War of Thirty Years we actually did not see in all of Europe any remarkable shifting in the religious geography. Thus, if after the death of Moses Schreiber, the Congregation would have become a victim of modernism, it most likely would have shared the fate of other congregations, which in former years were amongst the leaders of traditional Judaism. Having resisted this movement during the first attack, it became stronger and stronger. After the death of Samuel Wolf, there was a movement to break the chain of tradition. But after the death of Simchah Bunem there was not the slightest attempt at a resistance, and as a foregone conclusion, the son of the deceased rabbi, Akiba, named for his great great grandfather, was elected the successor of his father, after the latter's death. People take pride in the force of historic tradition, and so Pressburg retains today, as in years gone by, the privilege of the traditions as they existed all over Judaism until the days of the French Revolution. In 1913 a fire destroyed the Pressburg ghetto, and also the home of the Yeshibah. But the loss was partly recuperated, and the Congregation, being assisted by many outsiders, especially Hungarians living in America, is going to rebuild the old home for the Torah. Whether it will be possible to maintain this artificial tradition for years to come is a matter that calls for very grave doubt. The old-fashioned way of having a boy educated in Talmud, and then having him married and started in business, becomes more and more impossible. Modern business life requires a better training, and in addition, professions and even the rabbinate claim a different kind of training. A great many of the students of the Pressburg Yeshibah have gone out as modern rabbis, and even those of the strictest orthodox type, like Rabbi Solomon Breuer of Frankfurt am Main, and Solomon Spitzer, of Hamburg, found it necessary to obtain in some way or other, a university degree. Pressburg has not advanced so far as yet, and this reminds us of an old little anecdote which is highly illustrative: Near Budapest is a small town called Stampfen, distinguished by its orthodoxy. A man once proposed the question, "What is the difference between Stampfen and Budapest?" and he answered. "In Stampfen the women do not yet wear a Scheitel, and in Budapest they do no more wear it." For the explanation the following has to be added. The traditional way amongst the German and Polish Jews was that a married woman had to have her hair covered, just as has been seen amongst the Catholic nuns, where it is undoubtedly an old Oriental custom representing the idea that a married woman must belong to no one else except her husband, and, as a nun is supposed to be the bride of Christ, she also must give up the desire of pleasing any man. About the end of the eighteenth century, when Jews entered into a new phase of life, adopting the social customs of their neighbors, the bonnet which covered the hair of a married woman was replaced by a substitute, the wig, which, while covering the natural hair, tried to retain its appearance. The orthodox first opposed this terrible innovation, and then adopted it. In this way the reformers of today become the conservatives of tomorrow. Western orthodoxy in Judaism allowed some kind of academic training after the Yeshibah instruction. Eastern orthodoxy, as represented in Pressburg, rejects this compromise, for which the wig of women is a symbol, still retaining the old Yeshibah bonnet. The time may yet come, when Moses Sofer's successors will work for a Ph. D.

EXPLANATION FROM SIR REGINALD WINGATE.

In the February issue of the News we published an extract from an address as published in the "London Times" by Sir Reginald Wingate, the governor-general of the Soudan, which contained insulting reference to Jews. The attention of the Sirdar having been called to the fact, the following explanation was sent to the London "Jewish Chronicle" by Sir Andrew Wingate, a relative.

"The Governor-General of the Soudan recently delivered a very able address to the Arab leaders, which was locally well received by all sections of the community. His Excellency's words had no small share in bringing about that remarkable testimony of loyalty to British rule, which has so astonished our enemies and gratified our whole Empire. A translation was published in the London newspapers, and a reference to the misguided group of men at Constantinople, which has induced Turkey to commit suicide, as a 'syndicate of Jews, financiers and low-born intriguers,' was misunderstood by the Jewish Chronicle and other important newspapers as an attack on the Jewish race. The phrasing is unfortunate, perhaps, but it concerns one or two miscreants and has no reference to Jews as Jews. Had the Sirdar known that his speech would be read in English he would have qualified these words, which, as they stand, have given offence. There was no intention to disparage Jews generally in any way. and the Sirdar would be the last person to use any language which would wound a body of people of whom the world expects so much. The relations between the Jewish community in Khartoum and the local population are excellent, and no such construction was placel on the words where they were uttered."

STATUS OF THE JEWS AFTER THE WAR.

An important meeting was recently held in Milan and was attended by many prominent Italian Jews, including Luzzatti and Ottolenghi. It was decided at the meeting that the Jews of Italy shall join hands with the Jewish bodies of other lands that are now working in behalf of the Jews who are deprived of their rights in various lands. It is also reported that the French Jews will come in the general plan and work hand in hand with the Jews of other lands to the same end.

Hebrew Orphans Home, Atlanta, Ga.

When the gems in the Order's crown are being inspected, the Hebrew Orphans' Home, Atlanta, Ga., must needs arrest attention. Dedicated on March 28, 1889, after years of ardent preliminary work on the part of the Hon. Simon Wolf and associated brethren of District No. 5, the institution has for more than a quarter of a century stood as an exponent of all that is lofty in the Order's aims and aspirations.

The Atlanta Orphanage was the first to assume the title "Home" in lieu of the hereditary "Asylum," and then proceeded to dispose of the classical question, "What is in a name?" by conducting a real home.

By virtue of its well sustained progressiveness, the Home soon attained renown, but the management at no time showed a disposition to rest on laurels. Indeed, it became the living example of the motto:

"Without halting, without rest, Lifting better up to best."

Uniform attire was tabooed from the very start. So was seggregation in any form. By degrees, every practice that would tend to distinguish the orphans from other children was so thoroughly obliterated that only the initiated could tell the two apart. So consistently was this scheme pursued that the superintendent has never uttered the word orphan in the hearing of his charges, and he represses it in the mouth of others. And yet, there is an esprit de corps which manifests itself in many ways, but in none more formidably than in the work of the Alumnal Association. In point of numbers one of the smallest, it is in point of performance, beyond peradventure of doubt, the biggest in the land.

The Atlanta Home has fathered another feature in which, though imitated promiscuously, it stands unexcelled—nay, unapproached. It has invoked life insurance as an aid to endowment, and is now the beneficiary of more policies than any sister institution.

The Atlanta Home is a pioneer in what it calls the "Dual system." In the contention that has arisen between the congregate institution and the home-finding society, Atlanta readily recognized the merits of both, and instituted subsidies and pensions whenever that course was possible. At the same time, the fixed establishment was continued for those who were avowedly best served in it. At the present moment, eighty-four are supported in, and thirty-five out of, the institution, involving a total expenditure of $22,000.00.

The property of the Home is valued at $100,000. The "Simon Wolf Endowment Fund" is small ($58,000.00) but growing. The death rate is 1/25 of one per cent, probably a record.

The institution in general is well epitomized in the language of the superintendent at the conclusion of his 26th annual report:

"The Home has attracted attention and support not by virtue of loud claims, nor by the artifices of the advertising agent, but by the quality of its output. The commingling of the children in the public schools and in the Temple, the absence of restraint, the weekly spending money, the non-existence of corporal punishment, the infusion of hope for reward in lieu of fear of punishment, the becoming attire, and other essentials, have produced a type of childhood, as bright, as obedient, and as lovable as can be found anywhere. So it happens that in their meanderings they shunt the bad associate, and form connections with the best people in the city. Four times the boys accomplished the feat, ordinarily performable only by the pressure of influential friends, of securing appointments as pages in the legislature, entirely unaided and unabetted. They inspect factories, examine displays and price merchandise with the assurance of one exercising a right. And they visit the newspaper offices, and weave around their childish experiences tales so full of interest and charm, that time and again the dailies have surprised me with their publication. Yes, the children themselves gain us much good-will, more than is discernible on the surface."

The officers are: Hon. Simon Wolf, Honorary President; V. H. Kriegshaber. President; Lionel Weil and J. H. Hirsch, Jr., Vice-Presidents; Max Cohen, Treasurer; M. Frank, Chairman; Oscar R. Strauss, Vice-Chairman; Fred Schiff, Secretary; R. A. Sonn, Superintendent; Miss Gussie Jackson, Matron.

The Jewish Question.

Eugene H. Lehman, M. A., in the current issue of the B'nai B'rith News returns most ingeniously to the solution of the Jewish Question. He expresses it and tells why it is. He then proceeds to state what is not, what is the solution. It must be an ideal, international, democratic and practical. He then tells attempted or suggested solutions; and he evidences Strack's recommendation of assimilation, Zionism, Liberal Judaism, and he discovers that each and every one of these lacks one or more of his enumerated qualities and quantities. What then? B'nai B'rithism. For this contains and embraces everything in the solution that is necessary. Good. And so it does. But so does Zionism. Come to think of it, however, Mr. Lehman has omitted one important matter that could possibly be tried with some success, namely, JUDAISM. It does not occur to many that Judaism is the solution, since it presents a lofty ideal, it is international, democratic and practical. And furthermore, Judaism encourges assimilation and fears it not. This is admirably expressed in the Midrash, where in relation to Moses it is said that his outer garment, his education, or culture, or university training, was Egyptian, but the native Jewish was enshrined within his soul. Zionism offers a home, a legalized asylum, for the persecuted Jew and the [illegible] suffering disability in the cruel land [illegible] birth. There is nothing un-Jewish [illegible] Liberal or Reform Judaism is not anti-Jewish. It is an international movement and an old movement, and is accomplishing to some extent. It has, however, never been adduced as a solution to the Jewish question. There remains Mr. Lehman's idea, the Independent Order B'nai B'rith, a great institution, really the national and international mouthpiece of world Jewry. Nevertheless, this great institution has never presumed to displace the synagog or the congregation. On the contrary, it has always and everywhere helped these bodies; it has complemented and supplemented their work. Since each and every idea advanced possesses some large Jewish purpose, it may not be out of the way to say that Judaism, which embraces all these efforts and more, can be utilized and lived and developed so as to form the solution of the Jewish Question. There would not be anything anomalous in this.—Editorial in the "Jewish Tribune," Portland, Ore.

According to statistical tables published in Russian newspapers, the number of Jewish soldiers participating in the war on the Russian side exceeds 350,000 and will reach the number of 425,000 when the recruits of 1916 are called to the colors. The number of Jewish dead, wounded and missing till December 31, 1914, amounted to 42,000. On this ratio it may conservatively be estimated that the total number of wounded and missing Jews to date must be somewhere between 70,000 and 75,000.

The Jewish Exiles in Poland.

It has now been definitely ascertained that as a result of anti-Semitic slanders, all the Jewish inhabitants of Prushkoff, Bolinov, Viskitok, Mstchnow, Szirardoff, Novomiesto, Biala, Piasetzno, Groitz, Guracalvaria, Leshno, Blone, Mogilnitz, Nadarzin, Kornitz and other minor places were exiled. One ailing Jewess only was allowed to remain at Szirardoff for a few days. So far, 30,000 exiles arrived at Warsaw. A most pitiful sight was the entry into the Polish capital of parties of blind, injured, ailing, and feeble-minded Jews who, too, had to go. Most of the synagogues were placed at the disposal of the refugees. As a result of a petition to the Governor-General a few trains were sent to convey some of the wandering exiles. Even the Polish Committee was moved by the terrible scenes to promise assistance to the Jews.

The Governor of Kieff has declined to permit any of the Polish Jewish exiles to settle in the city. As so far the Jews of only two places (Biala and Novomiesto) were allowed to return in consequence of the discovery of the falsehood of the anti-Semitic libels, the anti-Jewish press in Warsaw is afraid that the influx would strengthen the Jewish element in the city, and it demands the transportation of the exiles to Siberia.

In the opinion of the Deputy for Moscow, M. Novikoff, the exiles are entitled to compensation by the state.

OBJECTION OF CATHOLICS TO BIBLE READING IN THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

We publish herewith statement by Archbishop Mueller of Cincinnati why Catholics object to the reading of the Bible in the public schools.

"I deplore the fact that so many people of our country are growing up without any religion. I hold religion of more importance even than secular knowledge. I believe that religion besides secular branches should be taught in the schools; but I do not think the present project of reading the Bible or selections from it will accomplish its end.

"If selections only of the Bible are to be read, what selections will be chosen? What we Catholics consider very vital in a passage would be thought unimportant by those who differ from us in faith; hence the latter would be in favor of omitting what Catholics would insist be inserted.

"If the whole Bible is to be read, several objections present themselves.

"Those of the Jewish faith will object to the reading of the New Testament.

"We Catholics will object to any Bible except the Douay Edition; we cannot accept the King James' Version.

"No matter what restrictions are placed on the teachers it will be impossible to control some of the teachers from putting their own construction on passages from the Scriptures. In that way these teachers will prejudice the minds of the little ones against the faith of their parents."

The Present and Future of District Grand Lodge No. 5

By Rabbi Geo. Solomon, Savannah, Ga.

The very title of my subject suggests first that this District has a past and incidentally implies the thought of growth and progress.

As the individual is bound up with the community of which it forms a part, so necessarily a District is indissolubly connected with the Order of which it is a subdivision. During the past few years, while the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith was rounding out the third quarter of a century of its existence, the idea seemed to obtain that for an organization as for an individual, the three score years and ten seemed to be the limit of its natural life, and the notion gained ground that the Order was in its senility having outlived its usefulness, and therefore ready for orderly and decent burial. Curiously enough, coincident with the idea that the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith had outlived its usefulness and therefore had no further reason for existence, we note the growth and widespread activity of the several Jewish Fraternal Orders which have taken up the discarded projects of fraternal insurance, sick benefit and general relief of needy members, which bitter and costly experience caused the I. O. B. B. to abandon. The wider field of endeavor, embracing the welfare and the need of Jewry throughout the world, has been assumed by the American Jewish Committee. It has never been seriously suggested, as it could not be maintained, that the present leadership and character of membership of the I. O. B. B. in any wise falls below the splendid standard set up by the past leaders and rank and file. It is, to say the least, difficult to understand why, since we had in the Order an old and tried and trusted organization, in later years we need five or six different organizations to take up the different phases of the work it has assumed and so nobly accomplished during the seventy-five years of its existence, unless it be on the ground that we need new and wider media and facilities for honors, dignity and position.

This, as the other Districts, has experienced the evils of fraternal insurance coupled with the mistake of relief funds generously provided out of rather slender dues. Thus it was that when ten years ago I first entered District No. 5, I was surprised and chagrined to learn that its roster boasted no more than nine hundred members, and when I attended the first convention of this District held in Washington, I noticed the great preponderance of venerable faces and gray heads and the all-absorbing interest taken in the one supreme topic that came before the convention, namely, the matter of endowment and the size of the assessment. Quite a different situation presents itself to us now with fifteen hundred members and the delegates to the General Convention consisting almost exclusively of young men, the great majority of whom appear to be well under the age of forty. It would appear that inspired by the example of that Perennial Youth Simon Wolf, who seems to grow younger and more active and virile with the passing years, the young men of District Grand Lodge No. 5 are beginning to realize that the famed fountain of eternal youth is not a material or geographical location, but a psychological or rather spiritual fact. We recognize in our honored and beloved leader of this District a forceful and impelling illustration of the truth that earnest unremitting pursuit of a noble and unselfish ideal quickens the physical activities and imparts to our spiritual nature those qualities which give the happiness, peace and power that laugh at the idea of age and do not admit of the thought of death. The situation, as we see it at the present time, is but an earnest of what may be, and we firmly believe, what will be in the years to come. Five years hence we will have around three thousand members and an active, energetic and beneficial enthusiasm, or denying the incontestable evidence of the past seventy-five years to be contrary, we will either have to admit that the Order has no appeal or else stamp ourselves as unworthy to carry on the tradition and unfit to shoulder the responsibilities.

It is neither because new and larger issues have presented themselves, nor better men have taken the helm or composed its membership, that is cause of present progress. The mistakes and the failings of the past are due neither to lack of power in the principles of the Order nor to a dearth of enthusiasm, energy and ideals on the part of the members and leaders. Every man and each generation will and must have its imperfections and its mistakes, but it is only fair and just for us to realize that it is the mistakes of the past that make possible the success of the present, it is only due to those who have borne the banner of the District since its existence until now, to say that we will be fortunate if we can do as well as they have done. Only because and to the extent that we, of the present generation recognize and strive to live up to the standard set by our predecessors, can we progress. The Order is neither a happy accident nor a negligible episode in Jewish history. It fills a want and supplies a need in Jewish life. Seventy-five years and more ago the founder of the Order recognized what has so strongly in recent years appealed to the leaders of the Zionist movement, namely, that not so much the exile and dispersion among the people of the world, but rather the admission into that world, with all the attractions and distractions of success, are the supreme tests which try the temper and the endurance of the Jewish people. Thus the Order was founded to conserve and consolidate Jewish interest and solidarity in dispersion, without antagonizing or entering into conflict or argument with the Zionistic ideals, it has taken cognizance of and fitted itself for the actual practical living problem, dealing with the reality that has existed for upward of two thousand years and is likely to persist for an indefinite time in the future. It is indeed hard to bring the ideal to the reach and grasp of the average man, who can deal only with concrete reality. Thus there is cause neither for wonder nor regret that the Order has thus far numbered not more than thirty thousand in its ranks. With absolutely nothing to offer in the way of personal or material benefit to its members, but making its appeal solely on the ground of benefits they can confer rather than receive, the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith, to my knowledge at least, is unique among all organizations. I know of no fraternity, secular or religious, which has been able to accomplish such a result. The mere existence of the Order is in itself symbolic of the genius and spirit of Israel as evidenced in its history and tradition. It has always scorned mere numbers and eternally through the ages has protested against the arrogance of the majority, bravely and unwaveringly proclaiming its belief in a truth which seemed gradually to gain more and more acceptance, namely, that the truth and the right are to be found with the minority. Thus it is not surprising to find that while the Order has not made any pretense of being numerically any stronger than it really is, none the less, within and without Jewry, it has stood and still stands in America as being a representative Jewish organization. It has attracted to its ranks and enlisted in its active service the strongest, the most representative and the ablest spirits of American Israel. It is at least beyond the possibility of doubt of contention that if one seeks to find the truly representative men in District No. 5, without a single exception they are to be discovered among the leaders of District Grand Lodge No. 5 of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith.

The future of the District is foreshadowed in the character of the Jewish population of these five South Atlantic states.

District No. 5 contains within its territory but four large cities, Baltimore, Washington, Richmond and Atlanta. From the Jewish standpoint it is rather sparsely settled and the great majority of the present Jewish population is composed of the recent immigrant class, popularly, though erroneously, denominated as Russian Jews. The future of the District from the standpoint of numbers as well as leadership, rests with these people. They have the double qualification for ideal B'nai B'rith in that all their traditions and much of their own experience has been, albeit, perhaps, unconsciously or subconsciously, the living out of the Judaic idea;

Annual Convention of District Grand Lodge No. 5

The 41st Annual Convention of District Grand Lodge No. 5, I. O. B. B., was held at Norfolk, Va., March 14th to 16th.

The preliminary exercises took place in the Temple Sunday night, March 14th, gracefully presided over by Rabbi Louis Mendoza, of Norfolk; the Orator of the evening being Rabbi E. A. Landau, of Albany, Ga., and the Essayist, Harry O. Sandberg, of Boston and Washington, D. C.

These addresses were supplemented by a stirring speech of the Hon. Simon Wolf, who, in his usual felicitous manner, made the assembled crowd feel the force of the appeal of the I. O. B. B. so splendidly illustrated in the person of the "grand old man" of District No. 5.

Following the exercises at the Temple there was open house at the Ghent Club, where the delegates were given the opportunity of mingling with their co-religionists of Norfolk.

The Convention proper began Monday morning at ten o'clock in the parlors of the Monticello Hotel. Mayor Mayo, of Norfolk, extended truly warm greetings, and the manner of his welcome assured all present of the sincerity of his words.

The delegation was one of the largest, and certainly most representative, that the District has gathered in many years. The old veterans were all on hand, and their judgment and knowledge and poise were splendidly reinforced by the interest and enthusiasm of the young men.

It is, of course, a truism that Conventions, if analyzed by the official report of what was accomplished, are almost invariably of no value, but it should be always borne in mind that it is not so much what is done, as the spirit of the meeting, which really counts. A convention, after all, is but a sort of central power station wherein annually are stored up the forces of interest and enthusiasm which will supply the working energy for the year. This spirit was finely illustrated in the meeting of District No. 5 at Norfolk, and it was further, a great deal to see so many young men and that too busy, successful, energetic business men, interested in the ideals of the Order and the special work of our District.

When the Reports of the President and Secretary were analyzed in the light of recent conditions, there was much cause for congratulation over the situation as now existing in No. 5. There is no dead timber being carried. The forces of the District have been splendidly organized, and there is every indication that though the territory is small and sparsely populated from the Jewish standpoint, while No. 5 can never hope to be numerically the largest, it is unquestionably, even now, as progressive as any.

The District is justly proud that it has furnished to American Jewry a Simon Wolf, its unofficial ambassador to the people of the United States, and appreciates the fervid eloquence of its distinguished orator, Edward N. Calisch, but more than this, the services of the one and the sentiments so beautifully expressed by the other, are the standard by which District No. 5 seeks to direct its energies and the ideals which it is ambitious to attain. It is only fair to say this, for all those who were present at the meeting were keenly conscious that the mere recital of motions or resolutions adopted and business transacted could not adequately describe the Convention, but that the temper of the proceedings was such as to give cause for real satisfaction to all who were privileged to be present.

Realizing that Florida is well night inaccessible to District No. 7, and the distance and expense of reaching them, make it well nigh impossible properly to organize the three or four centers where flourishing Lodges might be maintained, and as it is very close to and naturally part of District No. 5, the President and Secretary strongly recommended that this District request the transfer of Florida from No. 7 to No. 5, and the Convention unanimously indorsed the suggestion, hoping that the coming C. G. L. Convention will see fit to effect the change.

Officers elected for the ensuing year were as follows:

President—Rabbi I. E. Marcuson.

First Vice-President—Harold S. Bloomberg.

Second Vice-President—Milton Klein.

Sergeant-at-Arms—B. Wildauer.

Treasurer—H. Sternberger.

Secretary—Geo. Solomon.

And the Delegates elected to the C. G. L. Convention were: Hon. Simon Wolf, Dr. E. N. Calisch, John J. Cohen, Julius I. Peyser and Lionel Weil.

For the first time in over a decade No. 5 allowed mileage to its delegates for this Convention. but the well nigh unanimous sentiment was that this was both unnecessary and inadvisable, and that there was sufficient interest among the representative men in the District that they need no material impetus to induce them to attend the meetings, and the ideals for which the Order stands are sufficiently strong to impel those who can to attend the Grand Lodge sessions, and that it is a privilege to be enabled to take part in the activities which exemplify these principles, and the pleasure of meeting with and greeting their fellow members is of itself enough to warrant whatever trouble and expense may be incurred.

Albany, Asheville, Charleston and Savannah each extended cordial invitations for the next Convention, but the matter was left to the decision of the General Committee.

Though there was a large proportion of young men constituting the personnel of the Convention, it was gratifying to note that eight Past Presidents of the Grand Lodge were present—in fact, every living Past President was in attendance—which clearly indicates that while we are making a continual appeal to the rising generation, we are maintaining our hold.

What Our Lodges Are Doing

B'NAI B'RITH ACTIVITIES IN PORTLAND, ORE.

Theodore Herzl Lodge No. 314, at Portland, Oregon, has taken on renewed vigor with its new administration. The membership is jumping with leaps and bounds due to the indefatigable services rendered by the new president, Nathan Weinstein, and his capable assistants. This lodge bids again to become the banner lodge of District No. 4.

The Entertainment Committee, of which Brother Past-President M. Mosessohn is Chairman, and who is ably assisted by Brother B. W. Rubin, is doing wonders for the lodge and a program has been decided upon for the entire year. A most successful entertainment was held on Washington's Birthday at which the Superintendent of Schools L. R. Alderman delivered a talk and many other interesting features took place. About 400 were present. The affair was held in the new B'nai B'rith Building.

A Burlesque Dansant is to be held on April 1. During the latter part of May a river excursion and picnic has been arranged for by the committee.

The degree team of the lodge is doing splendid work in the performance of its duties. A class of twenty-five was initiated last month, and another class of equal number is to be initiated the latter part of this month. The degree team consists of David N. Mosessohn, Chairman; Geo. Rubenstein, A. Boskowitz, Ben W. Rubin, A. Rosenstein, H. Sigelman, J. Schwartz, Simon Cohn and Leo Shapirer.

Elaborate preparations are being made by the Portland lodges to entertain Judge Adolf Kraus and the other Constitution Grand Lodge officers and delegates and their ladies who will visit Portland on their return from the convention at San Francisco. A tentative program consisting of automobile rides around the city and surrounding country, a reception and banquet, a luncheon, and large B'nai B'rith meeting at Temple Beth Israel after divine services, has been arranged.

Portland Lodge No. 416 gave a most successful social and dance on Tuesday evening, March 16, which was well attended and proved to be a most enjoyable affair. President Dr. M. M. Bettman delivered a splendid little talk on the importance of Jewish people belonging to the B'nai B'rith Order.

District Deputy A. Boskowitz has been reappointed to this position in Portland by District Grand President Harry K. Wolff for another term.

Theodor Herzl Lodge and the Ladies' Auxiliary gave a rousing reception to Second Grand Vice President David N. Mosessohn, recently elected at the District Grand Lodge convention in San Francisco. Much activity is predicted due to Brother Mosessohn's elevation to this office as he is well known as aggressively active in behalf of the Order.

Much satisfaction has been expressed in Portland's Jewish community at his election, due to his intensely Jewish leanings and thorough imbuement with the B'nai B'rith spirit.

Brother Mosessohn was first selected a delegate to the District Grand Lodge during its session of 1904, at the age of 21; he is now 32 years of age. He is publisher of The Jewish Tribune of Portland, of which his father, Dr. N. Mosessohn, is editor. This publication is particularly well known for its strong B'nai B'rith editorial policy.

Nathan Weinstein, President of Theodor Herzl Lodge, has been exceedingly active in a membership compaign for his lodge and is devoting most of his time to the lodge work and to its upbuilding, spending a goodly portion of his business hours thereon.

The B'nai B'rith Building Association is making herculean efforts towards making the building a center of Jewish activities in Portland. Many classes are being organized in the Gymnasium and the building is becoming more and more popular in connection with Jewish communal affairs.

FARGO, N. D.

Under the auspices of John Hay Lodge No. 634, a committee of the lodge raised sufficient subscriptions to purchase a carload of flour for the destitute in Palestine. The total amount secured was $[illegible]96.00.

At an open meeting of the lodge held on Sunday, March 8, Mr Sidney A. Taller of Chicago delivered an address on the subject, "The New Social Spirit." The meeting was well attended and a general discussion on the subject was held after- [illegible]

LOS ANGELES LODGE LAUNCHES CAMPAIGN FOR NEW MEMBERS IN HONOR OF THE VISITING CONSTITUTION GRAND LODGE DELEGATES.

At the last meeting of the Committee of Arrangement for the visiting delegates it was decided that a banquet be given in their honor and also that they be taken to see the Mission Play.

However, the most important matter discussed was that of obtaining a class of candidates to be initiated by the President, Adolph Kraus, and the degree team that will accompany him. The evening given over to the initiation will be a noteworthy one in the history of the Lodge, and all energy will be used to present a class of considerable size. It will be an especially opportune time for the candidate, and no doubt many will be glad of the chance to join the B'nai B'rith under the auspices of the President of the Order. The initiation exercises promise to be out of the ordinary.

For the purpose of forming a large class the Committee has hit upon the plan of putting into the field two rival teams of twenty-five members each. Prizes will be awarded and all will possibly be done to gather into the fold all outstanding available candidates in the city of Los Angeles. There are many hundreds. There must be in a community of twenty thousands Jews.

The teams above mentioned will be captained by Brothers Isaac Pacht and I. R. Rubin. They will be permitted to appoint their own henchmen and to use all methods of warfare known to belligerent and neutral nations, international laws notwithstanding.

ACTIVITY OF WORCESTER LODGE, WORCESTER, MASS.

The degree team of Worcester Lodge No. 600, of Worcester, Mass., upon invitation of Horeb Lodge, No. 25, of New Haven, Conn., paid an official visit to the lodge and initiated a class of candidates of Horeb Lodge. Upon their arrival they were met by a committee of the lodge and were royally entertained.

On April 19, Worcester Lodge will celebrate the tenth anniversary of its institution in a fitting manner. The Intellectual Advancement Committee of the lodge has been authorized to make the necessary arrangements, and one of the features of the celebration will be a banquet at which all the Grand Lodge officers are expected to participate.

On the occasion of the celebration the lodge will be presented with the prize banner won in the competitive degree work. The presentation will be under the auspices of the Grand Lodge officers.

The Propaganda Committee of the District will also be present on the occasion to present the lodge with a token for the largest increase of members for the year 1914, the lodge having shown an increase of 80% for the year.

Arrangements are being made by the lodge also for the organization of a ladies' auxiliary.

The tenth anniversary of the lodge will be celebrated at the Hotel Bancroft and the Propaganda Committee of the lodge is at work now to secure a large class of candidates, which will be initiated by the degree team of Horeb Lodge of New Haven.

JOINT MEETING BETWEEN WASHINGTON LODGE NO. 19 AND EDWARD EVERETT LODGE NO. 97.

On Thursday, March 18, 1915, a joint meeting of Washington Lodge and Edward Everett Lodge was held at the meeting room of Washington Lodge, Terrace Garden, New York City.

In pursuance to a policy adopted by Washington Lodge, this was the second joint meeting held this year.

The occasion of the joint meeting was a lecture delivered by Brother Morris Jablow of Washington Lodge on "The Jew in the Legal Profession." The meeting was marked by a large attendance of both lodges. The lecture by the speaker of the evening was very interesting and brought forth a few remarks by the brethren who attended.

The Edward Everett Lodge was so enthused by the holding of these joint meetings, and it might be said now, that this is the second joint meeting held with Edward Everett Lodge, that the Washingtons had to promise to return the visit to a joint meeting held between these two Lodges at the meeting rooms of the Edward Everett Lodge.

MEETING OF THE GENERAL COMMITTEE OF DISTRICT LODGE NO. 8.

Grand President Timendorfer opened the meeting with some introductory remarks. He praised the good work which the departed Brother Dr. Metzenberg had accomplished for the benefit of the German Grand Lodge and the entire District. He also mentioned with gratitude the names of the deceased brothers, ex-President Meinhard Borchard, Julius Jacobi and Louis Sachs. Brother Timendorfer also reported that he had received a very pleasant letter from Brother Kraus, the President of the Order, in regard to the criticism made against the "B'nai B'rith News." Brother Kraus states, among other things: "It is only natural that in Germany where the feeling of patriotism runs high, any expression of opinion which is not strictly pro-German is looked upon with suspicion and mistrust. As far as I know, there is not a single Jew in America who believes that Russia will of her free choice grant rights to the Jews."

Brother Timendorfer also informed the General Committee that the Hilfsverein der deutschen Juden will issue a call for a collection for the war-suffering Jews in Galicia, Russia, and Palestine. In conformity with a previous understanding between the Hilfsverein and the Grand Lodge, this call will also be signed by the Grand Lodge. The General Committee concurred in this arrangement. The distribution of the amount collected will be made in conjunction with the other organizations and committees, in order to avoid scattering and dissipation of the funds.

Brother Dr. Paul Nathan proposed that the Grand Lodge should send a delegate to the Constitution Convention in America and the General Committee resolved to try to induce Brother Judiciary Counsellor Baerwald, of Bramberg, to undertake the journey.

Many of the lodges of the District have suffered financially and otherwise on account of the war and it was stated in the meeting that after the war a movement will be instituted on a grand scale for the aid of the suffering lodges in the border provinces and all questions of help will be attended to.

The former Secretary of the Grand Lodge of the Orient, Brother Dr. Auerbach, offered to deliver lectures in the German lodges and the General Committee highly recommended these lectures to the lodges.

COMMUNICATED

Lake Cities Lodge No. 696, I. O. B. B.

Ft. William, Canada, March 20, 1915.

Editor B'nai B'rith News:

Soon after hostilities began in Europe an appeal was made in this country to raise as much money as possible to aid the Jewish sufferers in the different countries of the war zone. Immediately we set ourselves to work and a committee was formed in our lodge (which was afterwards sanctioned by the whole community at a meeting held for that purpose in our Congregation), and thanks to the liberal way in which the committee was received we raised the sum of £32.6.0, which was immediately forwarded to the Secretary, Mr. A. Benjamin, of the First Lodge of England, I. O. B. B., and for which we have already received acknowledgment for same.

Shortly after we raised the sum which we now enclose $127.00 in the following manner. Forty dollars and twenty cents at the B'rith M'illa of Mr. M. Nitkin's new born son. Five dollars and forty cents at the B'rith M'illa of Mr. M. Laskins son. Thirty-eight dollars and fifty cents through the aid and good work accomplished by the Hebrew Ladies' Aid Society of the Twin Cities. Ten dollars at the B'rith M'illa of B. Rapport's son. Soon after a social and whist party was arranged by Mrs. H. Leff, wife of our Past President, which netted thirty-three dollars and fifty cents, which in all make up the above-mentioned and enclosed sum, all except sixty cents which went to the cost of purchasing draft and money order.

All the moneys herein enclosed shall be forwarded through the proper channels for the aid of the Jewish sufferers in the belligerent countries. Hoping that the war will soon end and that our brethren in the war zone will be relieved of the persecution and suffering they are now going through.

Fraternally yours,
CENTRAL WAR FUND COMMITTEE,
J. W. KASLER,
Secretary Treasurer.

"DAUGHTERS OF THE B'NAI B'RITH."

Of District No. 1.

Although the Daughters of the B'nai B'rith has been organized only a few months, it has accomplished a number of things of which the Order may well be proud.

The Sisterhood has a large membership and has undertaken numerous philanthropic activities.

During the winter season they sold coal to the poor of the City of New York at cost price.

For the Passover Holidays, they have collected numerous donations and have distributed among one hundred and six (106) poor and needy families, baskets of food stuffs consisting of matzoth, matzoth flour, eggs, vegetables and wine.

A Grand Lodge of the Daughters of the B'nai B'rith for District No. 1, has been formed, and deputies have been appointed by the Grand Lodge for the States of New York, Massachusetts and Connecticut, to form Chapters wherever organizations of the B'nai B'rith exist.

Samuel Roeder, Esq., has been appointed Deputy Patron of the State of New York.

Maurice Katz, Esq., has been appointed Deputy Patron of the State of Massachusetts, and is forming a Chapter in Worcester, Mass.

The officers of the Grand Lodge, for District No. 1, are as follows: Ray Rosenbaum, President; Clarence Y. Palitz, Grand Patron and Organizer; Elsie Rosenbaum, Vice-President; Bessie Leiner, Secretary; Lillian Levinson, Treasurer; Samuel Roeder, Chairmen of the Law Committee; Maurice Katz, Chairman of the Propoganda Committee.

The Daughters of the B'nai B'rith Chapter Number One is affiliated with the Maccabee Lodge No. 71 of the I. O. B. B. and this is the first Chapter formed in the State of New York.

The following are the Chairladies of the respective Committees appointed by the Chapter:

Rose Hochstein, Charity Committee.
Hilda Rosenbaum, Propaganda Committee.
Ida Levine, Publicity Committee.
Edna Polak, Law Committee.
Hortense Korn, Finance Committee.
Goldie Strassman, Membership Committee.
Rose Adelson, Sick and Relief Committee.
Juliette F. Joseph, Social Endeavor Committee.
Helen Silverstein, Entertainment Committee.

DAN LODGE NO. 593, CHARLESTON, S. C.

Dan Lodge now has the largest membership in the history of the B'nai B'rith in Charleston. There are now one hundred eight members in good standing, the maximum membership previously having been one hundred and two.

At the rate that applications are coming in, it is expected that the future growth of the Lodge will be even greater. The members in general are displaying great interest in the lodge's activities, and it has been found that enthusiastic members are in themselves excellent propaganda.

The officers and committees have been so active that the meetings are now looked forward to with pleasure. The attendance at meetings increases monthly, this is due to the fact that the meetings are made interesting through injection of special features and through the enlivening of proceedings in general.

In the death of J. Flaum, in February, Dan Lodge suffered a great loss. Brother Flaum was the oldest member of the lodge, and for years even up to within a month of his death, had taken an active interest in the work of the order.

BANQUET BY ISAAC LODGE, MILWAUKEE, WIS.

Under the auspices of Isaac Lodge No. 87, of Milwaukee, Wis., a banquet was held at the Hotel Pfister on March 9, 1915. The affair was attended by more than two hundred members of the lodge and visiting brothers. Brother Samuel Alschuler, of Chicago, was the guest of honor, and delivered a splendid address, which made a fine impression upon the members.

Rev. Dr. Charles Levy addressed the gathering in the absence of Governor Phillips, of Wisconsin, who was prevented from attending. Brother Charles L. Aarons, president of the District, acted as toastmaster. At the conclusion of the addresses dancing was indulged in.

What Our Lodges Are Doing

B'NAI B'RITH ACTIVITIES IN SAN FRANCISCO.

By Eugene B. Block,

Chairman of the Committee of Fifty.

A program of religious, educational, philanthropic and social activities extending over the entire year was adopted by the Committee of Fifty at its meeting last Wednesday evening, and the members enthusiastically pledged themselves to work harder than ever for a successful year.

This year's program, as arranged by a special committee headed by Richard E. Gutstadt is one of the most extensive and elaborate ever adopted by the committee and it is hoped by the members that the ten San Francisco lodges will give their unqualified support to the activities planned.

In addition to the work already outlined in the program, other activities are being considered, and the committee should have the busiest year of its existence.

Among the various events scheduled on the program are the annual picnic, the annual ball, observance of B'nai B'rith Day with athletic events at Golden Gate Park, a Chanukkah service for local members of the Order, an automobile ride through the city for members of the orphan asylum, and a final banquet to mark the close of the year.

Other activities suggested were referred to the program committee for consideration, and the program probably will be enlarged later.

The committee pledged its help and support to Grand President Harry K. Wolff and to the Ladies' Committee of the B'nai B'rith, which represents the three local auxiliaries of the Daughters of the Covenant.

Another important matter brought before the committee was the announcement by Grand President Wolff that hereafter the library and clubrooms in the B'nai B'rith Building are to be open day and night for the benefit of members. Arrangements for placing members of the committee in charge of the library and clubrooms each evening now are being made.

DEBATE BY CINCINNATI LODGE.

"Judaism is a creed and the Jews are not a race" was the decision arrived at by the participants in a debate by the members of Cincinnati Lodge No. 4, Cincinnati, Ohio, at a well attended meeting on March 22, 1915. Rabbi Jacob Mielziner and David Spritz defended Judaism as a creed and Leonard Freiberg and Jacob Hermann championed the racial side. The judges were Judge B. S. Oppenheimer, Victor Abraham and H. J. Levi. The meeting was unusually well attended and the members displayed a lively interest in the proceedings.

ZION LODGE, COLUMBUS, OHIO.

The members of Zion Lodge No. 62, I. O. B. B., realizing that outside of the routine work of the lodge some attention should be paid to the social side of life, are planning a series of entertainments, including smokers, dances and minstrel shows.

Zion Lodge is gradually adding a new element by the coming in of the younger members. It is interesting to note that at many meetings fathers and sons are present. There seems to be a renewed interest in the work of the Lodge.

The regime of President Robert Lazarus bids fair to be one of the most successful in the history of the lodge. Worthy of mention is the fact that Robert Lazarus represents the third generation of the Lazarus family in the presidency of the Lodge.

On Monday night, March 22, the entertainment committee gave a smoker and dinner, which proved a great success.

BETH ZUR LODGE, MOBILE, ALA.

The semi-monthly meeting of Beth Zur Lodge No. 84, of Mobile, Ala., held on Sunday morning, March 21, 1915, was unusually well attended. The Lodge voted unanimously to endorse the proposition of the Grand Lodge officers to eliminate the usual annual convention of the District Grand Lodge, to be held at Little Rock, Ark., and to hold instead a business session at New Orleans, devoid of any entertainment features and to be composed only of one representative for each lodge. The purpose of this change is to enable the Grand Lodge to apply the funds usually expended for the holding of the convention for the relief of the sufferers in the war stricken countries.

THEO. HERZL LODGE, PORTLAND, OREGON.

These are great days for the B'nai B'rith members of Theodor Herzl Lodge of Portland, Oregon. Each meeting brings new enthusiasm into the lodge, something different in the way of entertainments and the result is large attendances. "Big Time, Good Time, Bnai Brith Time" is every second and fourth Tuesday of each month for Theodor Herzl Lodge.

On Tuesday evening, March 23, a jolly "smoker and dutch lunch" was held, 100 members being present.

David M. Roth, the world's greatest memory expert entertained the members with his remarkable demonstration of thinking and remembering.

JOSHUA LODGE, PHILADELPHIA, PA.

An enthusiastic and largely attended meeting of Joshua Lodge, No. 23, was held March 9. As anticipated, the reports of the various committees proved of much interest to those assembled.

The Committee on New Quarters has secured a satisfactory home for the lodge, and final action will be taken at the next meeting on this question.

A card party and dance was held Sunday evening, March 21, for the members and ladies.

An important and interesting part of the proceedings of the evening was the report of the Chairman of the Prison Aid Committee. This is a work which has recently been taken up by the B'nai B'rith in Philadelphia. The report though but a preliminary one, showed the activity of the committee.

Mr. Aaron D. Faber, superintendent of the Jewish Foster Home, addressed the lodge on the subject of "Social Service." He commended highly the work of the Prison Aid Committee.

MEMBERSHIP CAMPAIGN IN SAN FRANCISCO.

Preliminary to the class initiation of 250 candiates, by a splendid drill team, before the convention of the Order to be held in the early part of May, a campaign for members is now being waged vigorously by members of the San Francisco lodges.

The campaign is under the direction of Mr. Harry K. Wolff, the president of District Grand Lodge No. 4.

The committee of fifty representing the local lodges has endorsed the membership campaign, and appointed special committees to aid the work. Enthusiastic responses are pouring in and it is anticipated that the desired number will be secured long before the date of the initiation.

B'NAI B'RITH OF PORTLAND PREPARE TO ENTERTAIN CONSTITUTION GRAND LODGE OFFICERS.

Elaborate preparations are under way for the entertainment of the officers and members of the Constitution Grand Lodge convention on their return from the convention city in May.

A joint committee consisting of the presidents and vice-presidents of the local lodges, the district deputy, the ladies' auxiliary deputy and the District Grand Lodge officer residing in Portland, has been formed, who will have charge of the entertainment.

A tentative program has been arranged to include auto drives in the city and surrounding country, a banquet, a luncheon and a B'nai B'rith joint meeting at Temple Beth Israel.

CLASS INITIATION BY ARGO LODGE, WASHINGTON, D. C.

More than one hundred candidates were initiated as members of Argo Lodge No. 413, of Washington, D. C., at a well attended meeting of the Lodge held on March 30, 1915. Those in charge of the ceremonies were: — Dr. Abraham Simon, Judge Milton Strasburger, H. O. Sandberg, L. Bretzfelder. F. N. Pelzman, and D. Weiner. Mr. Asolph Brandt acted as master of ceremonies. Brother Simon Wolf presented a report of the recent convention of the District held in Norfolk, W. Va. Brief addresses were made by Rev. Dr. L. Grossman and A. C. Mayer.

A little sketch entitled " The Argo Dialogue" was given by several members of the lodge.

After the close of the meeting refreshments were served and a social evening was spent.

GLUECKAUF LODGE.

Glueckauf Lodge, No. 493, of Essen, has eight brethren and nineteen relatives of brethren at the front. Brother Advocate Gottschalk was promoted to Lieutenant. The brethren advocate Ernst Cohn, Hermann Steinberg, Dr. Ad. Jonas, Max Loewenstein and the above mentioned Brother Advocate Gottschalk received the Iron Cross. The brethren Dr. Cohen, Dr. Mendel, Dr. Schueler, Dr. Hirtz, Dr. Schopp and Dr. Levy are active in the Reserve Hospital in Essen. Of these Dr. Mendel, Dr. Schopp and Dr. Levy are head physicians. Dr. Levy and Dr. Hirtz are managing the bandaging station of the Red Cross in Essen. Thirteen relatives of brethren are active as assistant nurses.

Contributions.

In August, even before the public was called upon to contribute, the lodge donated 2,000 marks to the Red Cross.

In October and November the lodge arranged a hospital in the Catholic public school which was placed at the disposal of the Red Cross. The cost of furnishing this hospital was between twenty-five and thirty thousand marks.

The lodge first contributed 1,500 marks to the hospital train of the Grand Lodge and then appropriated the additional sum of 500 marks. Besides this many of the brethren and sisters take part in the general war relief work and contribute to the support of the public soup kitchens, to the depot service, to the lint-making stations, etc.

The great events of the day have brought the brethren closely together, they meet unconstrainedly on Wednesday evenings, between the official meetings. Lectures on the events of the war are delivered in the lodge room.

INFORMAL DINNER BY THE CHICAGO LODGES.

Under the auspices of the Central B'nai B'rith Council of Chicago, representing the local lodges, an informal dinner was given at the Hotel La Salle on Wednesday evening, April 14, 1915, which was largely attended by the members of the Order and their ladies.

The speakers of the evening were Prof. Edward C. Baldwin, of the University of Illinois, who spoke on the subject, "The Jew in Literature," and Mr. Charles L. Aarons, of Milwaukee, President of District Grand Lodge No. 6, who spoke on the subject, "Work of the I. O. B. B." Mr. Wm. Wilhartz presided and the addresses were followed by general discussion, participated in by many members.

RAMAH LODGE, CHICAGO, ILL.

An unusually well attended meeting of Ramah Lodge No. 33, was held on the evening of April 8, 1915. Excepting the initiation of a class of candidates the regular order of business was dispensed with and the greater part of the evening was given over to the social features of the meeting.

The following program was carried out:

Violin Solo...........Mr. Benjamin Paley
Vocal Solo............Mr. J. K. Chapman
Address........Maj. M. L. C. Funkhouser
"Vice Conditions and Motion Picture Censorship."
Vocal Solo............Mr. J. K. Chapman

Popular songs by professional artists.
Refreshments.

LOUISVILLE, KY.

Louisville Lodge No. 14, I. O. B. B., has made a change in its meeting place. It has moved into the beautiful Lodge Room of the new Y. M. H. A. Building, and the beneficial effect of the change has already become apparent.

On March 24th, the Lodge gave an entertainment to which the members, their families and friends were invited. The program was as follows:—

Opening Remarks, Mr. Joseph Lazarus, President Louisville Lodge No. 14, I. O. O. B. B.

Violin Solo, Mr. Bernard Schweitzer.

Address, "Your Million Dollar Corporation, The Louisville Public Schools," Dr. I. N. Bloom.

Vocal Solo, Miss Edna Jones.

Accompanist, Mrs. Sidney J. Meyers.

The meeting was well attended and the Entertainment Committee is arranging for another "Open Meeting" to be held in the near future.

The Committee on Social Service gave "Sedar" to the Jewish inmates of the Indiana Reformatory, in Jeffersonville, Indiana, which is located just across the Ohio River from Louisville.

FRIEDRICH LODGE.

Friedrich Lodge, No. 444, of Heidelberg, started its activities on August 5, 1914, with a special meeting called for the purpose of appropriating 300 marks for the "Red Cross."

In the sewing and knitting room the wives and daughters of the brethren prepare gifts from materials which they furnish with their own means. These gifts are turned over to the Red Cross for the benefit of the Galician refugees.

In addition to the above mentioned 300 marks the lodge has contributed 300 marks to the city collection for the families of those who participate in the war, 200 marks for East Prussia, 200 marks for Alsacia-Loraine, 100 marks to the Social Commission of the Jewish Community, 1,000 marks to the hospital train, 100 marks to the "Red Crescent," 950 marks for the Galician refugees who found shelter in Bohemia. It also collected 1,000 marks which it sent the Red Cross.

The lodge sent Chanukkah gifts to all brethren and their sons in the field.

On the occasion of the celebration of the Kaiser's birthday, the Jewish soldiers of the garrison were gathered for an afternoon and treated to coffee. These afternoon gatherings are to be continued. The second gathering took place on Purim.

DALLAS LODGE, DALLAS, TEXAS.

The members of Dallas Lodge No. 197 enjoyed the second Intellectual Culture Meeting of the year at B'nai B'rith Hall Wednesday evening, March 24.

A program of unusual interest was prepared by Brother Milton Pandres, chairman of the arrangement committee.

The principal address of the evening was made by Rabbi Geo. Fox of Fort Worth, who spoke on "B'nai B'rith and the Modern Jewish Conscience."

President Alfred L. Bromberg introduced the speakers, including Brother Jules K. Hexter, who presented a most interesting review of the lodge's finances.

Short talks were also made by Dr. Wm. H. Greenburg and Brother Ullman of Birmingham, a visitor to the meeting.

Following the program the members adjourned to the B'nai B'rith club rooms, where refreshments were served.

FRESNO LODGE, FRESNO, CAL.

On the second night of the Passover, a Seder and banquet were held at Hotel Fresno, Fresno, Calif., at which eighty Jews were present. Rabbi Edgar F. Magnin, of Stockton, Calif., conducted the Seder and explained the symbols of the Passover. After the banquet an enthusiastic meeting was held. Rabbi Magnin gave a stirring, informal and very personal appeal, following which various of Fresno's representative Jews spoke. The result was the formation of a new congregation, religious school and sisterhood. The religious school will meet for the present in the home of Mrs. Louis Mendelsohn. It was arranged that Rabbi Magnin will come down from Stockton at least once in two weeks if not more often to give a series of lectures on "Jews and Judaism." At the same time he will instruct the children and train teachers to carry on the work in his absence. The election of officers in the Congregation and Sisterhood and other details of organization will be worked out in the near future. The affair was given under the auspices of Fresno Lodge No. 723 I. O. B. B., of which Judge Isaac Myer is President and brothers Sol. Peiser, L. M. Mendelsohn and Morris Benar were the committee in charge of the arrangements.

LITTLE ROCK, ARK.

B'nai B'rith Day was celebrated by Little Rock Lodge, No. 158, at Temple B'nai Israel, on Tuesday evening, March 9, 1915.

President Asher delivered a stirring address on the work which the District is doing at the present time.

Brother Charles Hartman, of the Executive Committee, gave a delightful talk upon the work of the Executive Committee and praised the untiring efforts of President Kraus in behalf of the Order. Bro. Hon. Charles M. Stern made a deep impression upon all present by a beautiful and delightful talk on the ideals of the Order.

There are seven charter members of Gideon Lodge and five of them were in attendance at the meeting:

Hon. Simon W. Rosendale.
Dr. Herman Bendell.
Solomon H. Blatner.
Henry W. Lipman.
Solomon M. Hydeman.
Henry I. Herschberger.
Rev. Dr. Max Schlesinger.

After the set program a reception was tendered to the Grand Lodge officers. The evening was in charge of the Intellectual Advancement Committee of the lodge

TACOMA, WASHINGTON.

One of the facts that always makes a lodge meeting interesting is the presence of visiting brethren, and in that respect Tacoma Lodge No. 741 of Tacoma, Washington, has been favored at almost every meeting.

Monitor Feist, under whose guidance the Sabbath School of the lodge is progressing in a satisfactory manner, arranged a "Seder" service for the young folks. Many of the youngsters that witnessed the "Seder" have never observed such a ceremony before, and were very much interested in the proceedings.

The attendance at the lodge meetings is generally good and in order to keep up the record during the summer months the entertainment committee is planning interesting events.

PORTLAND LODGE, PORTLAND, ORE.

At a recent meeting of Portland Lodge No. 416, of Portland, Ore., resolution was adopted extending cordial invitation to all the members of the Order who will pass through the Rose City on their way to the Exposition at San Francisco, to call at the B'nai B'rith Club Building, where every courtesy will be extended and their stay made as pleasant as possible.

Portland Lodge has adopted a new [illegible], namely, that at each meeting [illegible] member is appointed by the President to read certain portions of the B'nai B'rith News.

LOS ANGELES LODGE, LOS ANGELES, CAL.

At the meeting of Los Angeles Lodge No. 487, of Los Angeles, Cal., held on March 9, 1915, President Berman in a forceful address brought to the attention of the lodge the disorganized condition of the local Jewish charities and urged that the lodge initiate some movement looking toward the unification of all charities without discrimination as to whence their respective support comes.

President Berman's address and proposition was heartily endorsed by Brother George N. Black and others, and as a result of the action of the lodge a committee of seven was appointed, each member of the committee representing some charitable or social organization of the city and authorizing the committee to call a conference of all the Jewish organizations for the purpose of unifying them.

Brother George N. Black gave an interesting talk on the proceedings of the recent District Grand Lodge convention.

Brother Salzman submitted a report on behalf of the committee appointed to work out plans for the organization of a ladies auxiliary.

RIMMON LODGE, RICHMOND, VA.

An open meeting of Rimmon Lodge No. 68, I. O. B. B., was held on Wednesday evening at Beth Ahabah Temple, at which Rabbi I. E. Marcuson, President of District Grand Lodge No. 5, addressed a large and representative gathering on the usefulness of the Order. An interesting musical program was rendered by Dr. Maurice Koblenzer, Miss Corinne Samuels and Miss Carrie Clarke. Brother Charles Hutzler gave an introductory talk on the objects of the open meeting. Refreshments were served by the ladies and all present were personally presented to Rabbi Marcuson.

The regular meeting of Rimmon Lodge No. 68, I. O. B. B., was held Sunday evening, March 21, at which the usual routine of business of the lodge was attended to, and the entertainment committee requested to prepare a program for another open meeting in April.

INSTITUTION OF PARKERSBURG LODGE, PARKERSBURG, W. VA.

Parkersburg Lodge No. 765 was instituted at Parkersburg, W. Va., on Sunday afternoon, March 21, 1915, with formal and appropriate ceremonies. A large number of officers and members of the District Grand Lodge were present and participated in the exercises. Following the institution ceremonies a banquet was served in honor of the visiting officers. Mr. Joseph Stern acted as toastmaster. An address of welcome was made by President Meyer Newberger. The toasts were responded to by Brothers Isidor Sobel, Rabbi Lazaron, Edward Hemple and others. Brother Isidor Sobel of Erie, Pa., past president of the District Grand Lodge, officiated and represented the Grand Lodge on the occasion.

The new lodge starts out auspiciously with a membership of forty. At the conclusion of the banquet dancing was indulged in.

HOPE LODGE, STOCKTON, CAL

At the regular meeting of Hope Lodge held on March 3, District Deputy S. S. Safferhill gave an interesting talk reviewing the work of the convention of the District, recently held in San Francisco.

On March 14 the lodge held its annual memorial service at Temple Israel, Rabbi Edgar F. Magnin and Brother Gus C. Ringolsky of San Francisco delivering the memorial addresses. A musical program was also carried out.

At the meeting of the lodge held on March 17, Rabbi E. F. Magnin gave an interesting lecture on the conditions of the Jews in Europe, depicting the hardships of our people and appealing for material help to aid the sufferers during the existence of the war.

RAINIER LODGE, SEATTLE, WASH.

Amid an impressive ceremony a class of six candidates was initiated at the meeting of Rainier Lodge No. 627, of Seattle, Wash., on March 11, 1915. As a tribute to President Lewis, who has just left his bed after a month's illness, a large and enthusiastic membership was in attendance. Besides the regular routine of business, interesting talks were made by several members of the lodge.

RESOLUTIONS ON THE DEATH OF DAVID LASER.

At a meeting of the board of managers of the Leo N. Levi Memorial Hospital, held on Thursday, March 11, the following resolutions were adopted:

"Whereas, The Author of Life and Death, in His infinite wisdom and justice, removed from our midst our friend and co-worker, David Laser; and,

"Whereas, David Laser has been most intimately associated with the work of the Leo N. Levi Memorial Hospital from the very beginning, having given his untiring efforts for a great many years to the work done by the association, and having served as its treasurer at the time of his untimely demise; and,

"Whereas, David Laser was a man whose heart ever beat with sympathy for the unfortunate and afflicted, whose judgment was clear and sound, and whose counsel in the deliberations of the affairs of the Leo N. Levi Memorial Hospital Association was ever wise and helpful; and,

"Whereas, In his sudden demise in the very midst of his activities, the board of managers of the Leo N. Levi Memorial Hospital Association lost one of its most faithful members whose presence and counsels will be greatly missed;

"Be it resolved, That the board of managers of the Leo N. Levi Memorial Hospital deeply deplore the loss of their co-worker, David Laser, and hereby extend their profoundest sympathy and sincere condolence to the members of his bereaved family.

"Resolved, That these resolutions be spread upon the minutes of the board of managers of the Leo N. Levi Memorial Hospital Association, be published in the local press and the B. B. News and a copy thereof sent to the members of his family.

"A. B. RHINE,
"ALBERT MEMDEL,
"D. BURGAUR,
"Committee."

MACCABEE LODGE, NEW YORK.

At the meeting held February 16, Brother Rabbi Herbert S. Goldstein delivered a lecture on "The Ethics of the Fathers," which was greatly appreciated by those present.

Brother Clarence Y. Palitz was the speaker of the evening on March 2, and he spoke concerning Purim and its significance to the modern Jews.

The meeting of March 16 was graced by the presence of Brother Henry Blank, of New York-Isaiah Lodge No. 1, who delivered an excellent address on "True B'nai B'rithism." At the conclusion of his address Brother Blank was highly applauded and the president expressed the hope that Brother Blank would be a frequent visitor of Maccabee Lodge.

At the conclusion of the meeting the members adjourned to the "Juliette," where the members of Maccabee Lodge were the guests of the "Daughters of the B'nai B'rith." Several of the members spoke and refreshments were served. After the meeting an informal dance was held.

ANNUAL "GET-TOGETHER" DINNER OF ARGO LODGE, WASHINGTON, D. C.

Argo Lodge No. 413, Washington, D. C., held its annual banquet in the Metropolitan Hotel on March 1, 1915. The dinner was the third annual affair given by the lodge. While the dinner was in progress Brother A. Brandt was called to the speaker's table and was presented with a gold medal by the toastmaster, in recognition of his valuable services to the lodge. During the banquet musical numbers were rendered by professional artists.

The occasion was graced by the presence of Congressmen Julius Kahn and H. M. Goldfogle; Commissioner of the District Brownlow; Rev. Dr. Rosenthal of Atlanta, President of District No. 5; Rev. Dr. George Solomon, of Savannah, Secretary of District Grand Lodge No. 5; Judges Pugh, Mullowney and Strassburger, and many out-of-town visitors.

Congressman Kahn, in addressing the gathering, referred to the work of the Order, drawing the distinction between the American Jew and the Jewish American.

Congressman Goldfogle discussed the immigration problem and emphasized the need of the proper distribution of aliens.

Commissioner Brownlow, in his remarks, predicted a Jewish nation in Palestine as one of the results of the European war.

Short talks were also delivered by many prominent members of the Order and the banquet was participated in by more than 200 members of Argo Lodge and their ladies.

COMMITTEE OF FIFTY REPRESENTING SAN FRANCISCO LODGES.

Following an enthusiastic reorganization meeting at which officers for the ensuing term were elected, the Committee of Fifty, representing the ten local B'nai B'rith Lodges of San Francisco, now has launched upon a new year and is earnestly pursuing its activities.

Reorganization of the committee for the year was effected last week when the newly-appointed delegates from the various lodges assembled and elected officers for the year. The newly-elected officers were: Chairman, Eugene B Block; vice-chairman, Abe Freedman; secretary, Julian Pinto; treasurer, J. T. Pechner; trustees, Henry Zekind, Milton Meyer and I. Friedman.

Before surrendering their chairs the outgoing officers received the unanimous thanks of the committee for their untiring efforts during the term just closed.

Chairman Block, in accepting the office, thanked the members of the committee and briefly outlined the work he believed the committee should pursue. He declared himself in favor of increased philanthropy by the committee both in and out of the Order and urged a greater volume of intellectual and educational work. Special committees to take up these matters, he said, would be appointed.

Other newly-elected officers and members of the committee pledged themselves to work untiringly in behalf of the 250 class initiation planned by the committee as a feature of entertainment during the Constitution Grand Lodge convention. An active campaign for members now is in progress.

Grand President Harry K. Wolff attended the meeting and in a rousing speech told the committee the importance of the work for it to perform this year. He pledged his co-operation in all activities.

The prosperous condition of the preceding term of the Committee of Fifty was shown by a report of activities submitted by Secretary E. J. Fletcher. A few excerpts of the report follow:

"During the year just closed the committee held 46 meetings, at which the highest attendance was 43, the lowest 11, and the average attendance 24. The grand president was present at eight of these meetings and one was held in his home. * * *

"The following affairs were given by the committee during the year: a Seder, two lectures, a boat ride, a picnic, an automobile outing to the inmates of the old people's home, two dances and a banquet."

CINCINNATI LODGE TO ENTERTAIN GOV. ALEXANDAR OF IDAHO.

Gov. Moses Alexandar of Idaho has accepted an invitation to visit Cincinnati Lodge No. 4 and address its members. Gov. Alexandar has the distinction of being the only Jewish governor in the country and is prominently identified with the B'nai B'rith. His visit to Cincinnati will be an event in the history of Cincinnati Lodge.

Committees have been appointed to make the necessary arrangements for the proper entertainment of the governor.

UNIQUE DINNER BY MEMPHIS LODGE.

Memphis Lodge No. 35, of Memphis, Tenn., was host at a unique and interesting affair held on March 4, 1915. It was the first "get-together" dinner and the occasion proved a most pleasant one. The sumptuous dinner consisted of choice viands and the courses of the dinner were interspersed by entertainers and speakers.

The Educational Committee, consisting of J. M. Samfield and E. Klein, presented an impromptu debate participated in by S. L. Lee and Dr. M. S. Simon. The Committee on Originalities presented a variety of entertainment. The Music Committee arranged a most excellent program. Rabbi M. Samfield and Rabbi Wm. Finescreiber delighted the gathering with eloquent and interesting addresses.

DAVID FISH LODGE, CHICAGO, ILL.

An open meeting of the lodge was held on the evening of March 15, 1915. A program consisting of musical numbers and a monologue was carried out. Judge James Gibbons was announced as the principal speaker, but owing to indisposition he was unable to be present.

What Our Lodges Are Doing

DISTRICT NO. 1.

Dr. Bernard M. Kaplan, secretary of the District, delivered an address at the Patchogue synagogue on Sunday, March 21, on the subject, "Benevolence and Morals as the Greatest Jewish Ideals."

At a well attended meeting of Jacob B. Ullman Lodge of Stamford, Conn., held on March 24, Dr. Bernard M. Kaplan, secretary of the District, was the guest of honor and delivered an address on "Judaism and the Order."

District Grand Lodge No. 1 at its recent convention held in Worcester, Mass., empowered the General Committee to sell its old people's home at Yonkers, N. Y. This home was built thirty-five years ago and is proving inadequate. The committee was further instructed to proceed with the erection of a new home as soon as arrangements for the sale of the old one are completed.

Montefiore Lodge No. 70, I. O. B. B., of Buffalo, N. Y., celebrated B'nai B'rith Day on March 21 with the initiation of fifty new members. The meeting was followed by a banquet, at which Louis J. Gibbs of New York, Herman Asher, president of the Grand Lodge, Charles Hartman of the National Executive Committee and Charles M. Stern of Albany, State Deputy, were the speakers.

At a meeting of Horeb Lodge No. 25, of New Haven, Conn., held on March 14, the members had the pleasure of watching the degree team of Worcester, Mass., conduct the initiation of a large class of candidates.

On March 10, 1915, Horeb Lodge held its annual ball at the Harmony Hall. The proceeds of the affair will be distributed among the various charitable institutions of the city.

Montefiore Lodge No. 701 of Buffalo, N. Y., has shown much activity recently. About a year ago the lodge had eighty members, but at the present time its roll consists of one hundred and ninety. Since the beginning of this year fifty-eight new members were initiated and every one of them is a quality member.

B'nai B'rith Day was observed at Temple Emanuel, New York City, on Sunday, March 28, by a special service presided over by Brother Rev. Dr. Joseph Silverman, who delivered an eloquent address.

At Hartford, Conn., Rev. Dr. Bernard M. Kaplan, Secretary of the District, gave the address at the B'nai B'rith Day celebration. Rabbi Emeritus Elkin, Rev. Dr. Ettleson participated in the service which was held at Temple Beth Israel.

Bro. Louis Kempner, the beloved President of the Board of Governors of the Home at Yonkers, has almost completely recovered from his recent illness and was present at the last meeting of the Board.

Henry Jones Lodge No. 79 has recently admitted a number of new members. Bro. Abr. Anhalt, President of the Lodge, is working earnestly and energetically in behalf of the lodge.

Joseph G. Shapiro, Vice-President of Harmony Lodge No. 711, has been elected on the Borough Counsel of Shelton, Conn. He is also prosecuting attorney of the town of Huntington, which has the distinction of electing the first Jew to office in the United States in 1738, when one of our co-religionists was elected member of the Colonial Assembly of Connecticut.

A well attended and spirited meeting of Amos Lodge No. 121, of Boston, Mass., was held recently at the lodge's headquarters, at which several candidates were initiated.

A committee composed of Bros. H. Duschnes and G. Housman of Edward Everett Lodge No. 97, and headed by the popular President, Julius Levy, have undertaken the duty of increasing the membership of this lodge. The lodge was recently addressed by Bro. M. P. Davidson, the silver-tongued orator of Flatbush Lodge.

Chananiah Lodge No. 165 held a special meeting on March 7, which will long be remembered by all who were present. Two of the oldest living ex-Presidents, who just celebrated their 70th birthdays. Bros. Simon Gallinger and Emanuel Stern, were presented by President H. Weiss with engraved gold-headed canes, as a token of affection and respect on the part of the lodge for the splendid services these two venerable brothers have rendered the lodge. Bro. Maurice P. Davidson represented the General Committee and delivered a splendid address on the occasion. The meeting was a surprise to the two distinguished brothers, who expressed their appreciation with much feeling.

Secretary Brother Bernard M. Kaplan addressed Edward Everett Lodge No. 97 on April 7 on "The Ideals of the Order and Judaism." Bro. Kaplan is scheduled to deliver a special lecture at Bridgeport, Conn., under the auspices of Harmony Lodge No. 711, of which Maximilian Stein is President.

Hon. Charles M. Stern, of Albany, made a flying but welcome visit to the following lodges: Zerubbabel No. 53 of Rochester, and Jacob No. 91 of Syracuse, N. Y., and created much enthusiasm by his presence and his eloquent and earnest addresses.

Bro. Bernard M. Kaplan, Secretary of the District, has been invited to address the Jewish Institute of New York on Sunday, April 11. Dr. Kaplan will speak on "The Golden Mean of Jewish Ethics." He will also address shortly the Emanuel Brotherhood of which Brother Rev. Dr. Joseph Silverman is President.

Brothers I. B. Schmidt, I. Trum, A. G. Lutz and Julius Kirstein, the Brooklyn section Committee of the Intellectual Advancement Committee, are arranging a rally meeting to be held shortly in that city.

Rev. Dr. Bernard M. Kaplan, Secretary of the District, in response to an invitation, addressed the Jewish community of Patchogue on Sunday, March 21, and organized a religious school, which will be under the supervision of the B'nai B'rith Lodge of Patchogue. Secretary Kaplan also addressed the Jewish community at Stamford, Conn., Wednesday evening, March 28, under the auspices of Jacob B. Ullman No. 685. Brother Charles H. Shapiro, Chairman Committee on District Court, also delivered an address which was much appreciated by the lodge, of which he was the installing officer. Brothers Kaplan and Shapiro organized at Stamford a Ladies' Auxiliary, of which Mrs. Sally Kronholtz is the temporary President. Mrs. Sally Kronholtz and her husband, Bro. S. Kronholtz, District Deputy of Stamford, have done very much towards keeping up the enthusiasm and the good work of the lodge. President S. Wagner of Jacob B. Ullman Lodge was recently elected Exalted Ruler of the Elks. President Wagner and Vice-President Jacob Weissman and District Deputy S. Kronholtz are determined to increase the membership of the lodge.

Washington Lodge No. 19 gave an elaborate Seder on the second night of Passover to the members and friends of the Order. Bro. Rabbi Lipkind and Bro. Rev. Schlager, of Temple Emanuel, conducted the services. Bros. I. I. Lipsitch, Dr. M. M. Stark, Adolph Wald, Henry Meyers, Samuel Koffler and other active members contributed much towards the success of the Seder.

DISTRICT NO. 2.

The Columbus, Ohio, "State Journal," in its issue of Sunday, March 1, devotes the entire front page of its magazine section to a biographical sketch and portrait of Rabbi Jos. S. Kornfeld of Columbus, rabbi of B'nai Israel Temple, and president of District Grand Lodge No. 2. The "Journal's" sketch was most laudatory.

Director of Public Service, Brother Alfred A. Benesch. was installed as President of Cleveland Lodge No. 16, of Cleveland, Ohio, at a well attended meeting on the afternoon of Feb. 28.

A new campaign was inaugurated, and it is the aim of the lodge to increase its membership to six hundred before the convention of the District Grand Lodge is held.

The members of Barzillai Lodge No. 111, of Lafayette, Ind., gave an enjoyable card party to celebrate the feast of Purim on March 8, 1915.

Under the auspices of Missouri Lodge No. 22 and Ebn Ezra Lodge No. 47 of St. Louis, Mo., joint memorial service at the United Hebrew Temple was held on Sunday evening, April 25, 1915.

At a meeting of Ebn Ezra Lodge No. 47, of St. Louis, Mo., held on April 8, 1915, a class of candidates was initiated. The meeting was well attended, many visiting members of Missouri Lodge being present, to listen to the address of Rabbi Samuel Thurman.

Rabbi D. L. Liknitz of Leavenworth, Kansas, on behalf of the social service committee of District No. 2, conducted Seder for the Jewish inmates at the Federal prison at Leavenworth.

Jewish Easter was celebrated on March 30, 1915, by the Jewish inmates of the Ohio penitentiary, at Columbus, Ohio. The services were held in the forenoon by Mr. I. B. Jashenosky on behalf of the social service committee of District Grand Lodge No. 2. In the afternoon an additional service was conducted by Rabbi Jos. S. Kornfeld of Columbus, president of District Grand Lodge No. 2, who preached a sermon on "Freedom."

DISTRICT NO. 3.

The B'nai B'rith religious school of New Castle, Pa., under the auspices of New Castle Lodge and under the direction of Brother Marcus Feuchtwanger, held confirmation exercises at the Coliseum on Sunday afternoon, April 11, 1915. Rev. Dr. J. Leonard Levy, of Pittsburgh, officiated.

The members of Abraham Lippman Lodge No. 672, of Pittsburgh, Pa., were tendered by the president, Mark Nolan, a stag smoker at the meeting of the lodge held on February 24. After refreshments had been served an entertaining program was rendered by high-class performers.

The Sabbath-School of New Castle, Pa., under the auspices of New Castle Lodge No. 609, held a Purim entertainment on Feb. 28, 1915. After the services and the rendition of a program by the children each child was presented with some gifts, donated by Mr. and Mrs. Marcus Feuchtwanger, who organized the school and are actively engaged in its maintenance.

The quarterly meeting of Joshua Lodge No. 23, held on March 19, 1915, was largely attended. Various committees rendered their reports, among which was that of the Prison Aid Committee. Addresses by various members of the lodge were also delivered. The lodge has arranged for a social meeting and a class initiation to be held during the month of April.

The propaganda committee of Abraham Lippman Lodge No. 672, of Pittsburgh, Pa., held a meeting recently for the purpose of arranging for the social events of the lodge. It was decided to hold a card party on April 28, at which valuable prizes will be given and refreshments served. A stag smoker will be held on May 26, 1915.

Wheeling Lodge No. 615, of Wheeling, W. Va., held an exceptionally well attended meeting on Sunday evening, March 14, at which a class of candidates was initiated. The lodge also gave a luncheon and smoker, which was served by the Temple Guild.

Morgantown Lodge No. 766 was recently instituted at Morgantown, W. Va. Brother Isidor Sobel of Erie, past president of District Grand Lodge No. 3, was the installing officer.

Due to the efforts of Brother Edward Hemple of Pittsburgh, several lodges were instituted recently in West Virginia.

DISTRICT NO. 4.

Theo. Herzl Lodge No. 314, of Portland, Ore., gave a burlesque dansant on April 1, 1915, at the B'nai B'rith building, and the same proved a great success.

At the meeting of the lodge held on March 23, 1915, Mr. David M. Roth, memory expert, entertained the members. A class of candidates was initiated by the degree team and a smoker and entertainment followed.

Occidental Lodge No. 345 of San Francisco, Cal., observed Pesach with a special program, in charge of Cantor R. R. Rinder. Services befitting the occasion were conducted and addresses were delivered by several speakers.

The Ladies' Auxiliaries of Ranier and Hildesheimer Lodges of Seattle, Wash., gave a joint card party on March 18, 1915. More than five hundred guests were present and handsome prizes were awarded.

B. F. Peixotto Lodge No. 421 of Salt Lake City, Utah, was instituted in March, 1892. The lodge was composed of but a handful of enthusiastic young men and it was with much difficulty that the lodge was kept intact. The passing of the years found a gradual increase of membership and on the occasion of the official visit in May, 1907, of the then president of the District, Brother George N. Black, of California, a large class of new members was secured through the efforts of the then District Deputy, Rabbi Charles J. Freund, and his co-workers. The initiation exercises were conducted in the presence of Brother Lucius L. Solomons, First Vice-President of the Order, who gave inspiration to the occasion. Since then the membership has materially increased and in May, 1910, the lodge resolved to create a home for itself and launched a campaign for subscriptions, resulting in the sum of $4,700, to which was added the accumulated fund of the lodge, amounting to $3,500, and with this money the club building of the Ladies' Literary Club was purchased. The building has a frontage of 50 feet and is 80 feet deep. It is noteworthy that when the lodge dedicated its new home not a cent of indebtedness remained unpaid.

Samuel Lodge No. 668 of Vancouver, B. C., held its annual memorial services on Feb. 1, 1915. Rabbi B. A. Rosengarg conducted the memorial services and delivered an address.

At the last meeting of B. F. Peixotto Lodge No. 421, Salt Lake City, Utah, Brother Louis Marcus, a delegate to the recent convention of the District, favored the lodge with a report which proved interesting and informative.

Los Angeles Lodge No. 487 gave a smoker and cabaret at its lodge rooms on the evening of April 1. Professional talent from the various theatres and amusement places was secured to entertain the members.

Los Angeles Lodge No. 487 of Los Angeles, Cal., gave an I. O. B. B. Hop to its members and ladies on March 16, 1915, which proved a great success.

Etham Lodge No. 37 of Sacramento. Cal., held special memorial services at the temple on Feb. 26, 1915, where Rabbi Michael Freed conducted the services and Dr. I. G. Reynolds delivered an address.

Mr. Leon Salomon, venerable secretary of Etham Lodge No. 37, of Sacramento, recently celebrated his seventy-seventh birthday, on which occasion he was the recipient of many congratulations and tokens of esteem.

Preparations are in progress by the committee of Lasker Lodge No. 370 of San Diego, Cal., for B'nai B'rith day at the Panama-California Exposition on the occasion of the visit of the delegates to the convention of the Order.

Preparations are under way for the proper reception of the visiting delegates returning from the San Francisco convention by the B'nai B'rith Lodges of Portland, Ore.

The Daughters of the Covenant, auxiliary to the Portland B'nai B'rith lodges, gave a card party on March 2, 1915, at the B'nai B'rith hall.

Portland Lodge No. 416, of Portland, Ore., gave a social and dance on the evening of March 16 at the B'nai B'rith hall.

The B'nai Brith club of Portland, Ore., gave a dance on Wednesday evening, March 17, at the B'nai Brith building. The affair proved a great success.

Portland Lodge No. 416, of Portland, Ore., gave an invitation social at the B'nai B'rith building on March 16. Both dancing and cards were indulged in.

Theo. Herzel Lodge No. 314 and the Daughters of the Covenant of Portland, Ore., are making final arrangements for the burlesque dansant to be given on April 1.

Hildesheimer Lodge No. 503, of Seattle, Wash., gave a grand ball in March, which was successful in every way.

The ladies' auxiliary of Rainier and Hildesheimer Lodges of Seattle, Wash., gave a joint card party on the evening of March 18. Prizes for the winners were distributed. Refreshments were served.

Unity Lodge No. 273, of San Francisco, Cal., celebrated its thirty-eighth anniversary on March 11, 1915. After the formal exercises the members and their ladies attended the theatre in a body and afterwards repaired to the St. Francis Hotel, where refreshments were served and dancing was indulged in.

Ophir Lodge No. 21, of San Francisco, Cal., gave an elaborate dansant on Sunday evening, March 21. Special decorations were the feature of the evening.

On March 16 the Social Committee of Los Angeles Lodge No. 487 gave a dance at the B'nai B'rith hall that proved a delight to all those who partook of the evening's enjoyment.

DISTRICT NO. 5.

The annual banquet of Argo Lodge No. 413, of Washington, D. C., was held at the Metropolitan Hotel on March 1. Mr. Julius I. Peyser presided and addresses were made by representatives Julius Kahn, Henry M. Goldfogle, A. J. Sabath and B. Johnson, by District Commissioner Brownlow, and other federal and municipal officers, as well as by Hon. Simon Wolf, Rabbi Abraham Simon and Judge M. Rasburger.

Under the auspices of Gate City Lodge No. 144, of Atlanta, Ga., a grand concert was given at the Jewish Educational Alliance on Sunday, March 14, 1915.

The Norfolk, Va., section of the Council of Jewish Women entertained the visitors to the convention of District Grand Lodge No. 5, held recently, with a card party and dance on March 23, 1915.

At a meeting of Argo Lodge No. 413, of Washington, D. C., held on March 3, 1915, a class of candiates was initiated by the degree team. Mr. Sidney B. Lust, manager of the United Film Service, demonstrated the Animatograph, the newest thing in moving-picture machines.

DISTRICT NO. 6.

On April 1, 1915, Rabbi Frederick Cohn of Omaha will address the meeting of Nebraska Lodge No. 354, of Omaha, Neb., on the subject, "The Spirit of the Centuries."

Gilead Lodge No. 41, of Milwaukee, moved into new and larger quarters, holding its first meeting there on March 11, 1915. The meeting was unusually well attended and the lodge was honored by the presence of Brother Charles L. Aarons, president of the District, who addressed the lodge.

DISTRICT NO. 7.

Final arrangements for establishng a home for aged and infirm Jews in Memphis will be made after the meeting of District Grand Lodge No. 7, to be held shortly in New Orleans. Several substantial subscriptions have already been secured from enthusiastic champions of the home.

An enthusiastic meeting of Adasa Lodge No. 208, of Monroe, La., was held on March 25, 1915. The election of officers was the special order of business as well as the election of representatives to the convention of the District Grand Lodge. The lodge has made arrangements for the installation of its officers to take place on April 6, on which date a Dutch lunch and entertainment will be provided.

The recent meeting of Barnett Lodge No. 754, of Forest Park, Ark., was held on March 14, 1915, at which the members listened to an interesting and learned address by Brother Benjamin of Memphis.

District Grand Lodge No. 7 held its forty-third annual convention in New Orleans, beginning April 11, 1915.

The convention was originally intended to be held at Little Rock, but on account of the European war it was decided to curtail expenses of the convention as much as possible, so that as much of the funds of the district grand lodge as possible could be used to assist the war sufferers. For this reason also it was decided to have each lodge send only one delegate instead of the usual quota, which is one delegate for every fifty members. By thus minimizing the expenses of the convention, a larger sum will be available to helo their co-religionists who are sufferers as a result of the war.

At a well attended meeting of Dallas Lodge No. 197, of Dallas, Texas, held recently, Rabbi George Fox, of Ft. Worth, spoke on the subject, "B'nai B'rith and the Modern Social Conscience." This meeting was an open meeting and was devoted to intellectual advancement.

DISTRICT NO. 8.

District Grand Lodge No. 8 of Germany jointly with the Hilfsverein der Deutschen Juden issued a call for contributions to the Jewish Relief Fund to be used for the relief of suffering co-religionists in Galicia and the Orient.

THE HOSPITAL TRAIN OF THE GERMAN B'NAI B'RITH LODGES.

The first B'nai B'rith hospital train left Berlin on the last day of February carrying gifts for the wounded soldiers in the hospitals in the rear of the firing lines. Brother Privy, Counsellor Timendorfer, President of the Grand Lodge for Germany, accompanied this first hospital train and supervised the distribution of the gifts.

BEN B'RITH HONORED.

Mr. Wm. Feldman of New Orleans was recently elected to the highest position in the Grand Lodge of the Order of Odd Fellows, namely, that of Grand Patriarch at the annual grand encampment recently held in Shreveport, La. Mr. Feldman well merits the honor given to him as a public spirited citizen and loyal Jew and a good Ben B'rith. He is not only a participant but also a leader in all movements tending to the betterment of mankind.

We congratulate Brother Feldman and feel assured that he will reflect credit not only upon himself but upon all his associates.

ANNUAL BANQUET OF MONTEFIORE LODGE, BUFFALO, N. Y.

The annual banquet of Montefiore Lodge No. 70 of Buffalo was held at the Apollo Club on March 21, President Herman Asher, Justice Louis D. Gibbs of New York, Hon. Charles M. Stern of Albany, Morris L. Stern, District Deputy of Rochester, Rev. Dr. Max Drob, David Ruslander, Leopold Weil, President of the Lodge, Herman Weil and W. W. Saperstone, who acted as toastmaster, were the speakers on the occasion. Everybody enjoyed both the literary program and the banquet. President Leopold Weil and the Secretary, Michael Cohen, and Samuel Cristall, District Deputy of Buffalo, as well as a number of earnest workers, contributed much to the success of the evening. Montefiore Lodge has gained fifty members since the first of the year, and is in every way manifesting unusual activity. The visit of the out-of-town brothers was very much appreciated by the members of Montefiore Lodge. The banquet was pronounced one of the finest affairs ever given by Montefiore Lodge and will long be remembered by those who had the privilege of attending this beautiful function.

In his address Mr. Asher outlined the principles for which the order stood. It had become an international organization, he said, which had spread over the whole world. Organized in the United States, he said, 75 years ago it has spread until its influence and its branches may be found in every part of the civilized world today. "Like an oak," said Mr. Ascher, "the organization stands as a bulwark against the storm which is forever beating round the Jewish people and stands ready to protect them from the persecutions, defamations and prejudices to which they are constantly subjected.

"The Order of Judaism, orthodox or reformed, is neither radical nor conservative. The strength of Judaism rests in the belief that the faith of the fathers maintained through the centuries, in the face of the bitterest persecution shall not now be surrendered, but shall be preserved and perpetuated to be the guiding star for the Jew in the ages to come."

Louis D. Gibbs made a forceful appeal for the persecuted Jews in Poland today. "Our order," he said, "represents the ancient ideals of our people, the love of God, country and fellow men, which in the final analysis is the basis of civilization. The slur on the Jew, that he lacks natural courage and loyalty to his country, has been disproved on every battlefield in Europe. The most pathetic situation in Europe today, so far as the Jew is concerned, is the tragedy being enacted in Poland, where hundreds of thousands of Polish-Jew soldiers are enduring the rigors of warfare while their fathers and children are being murdered and their wives and daughters are being outraged by the soldiery of the government for whom they are fighting.

"There are now several million Jews in Poland without home or habitations of any kind. The male population, which has been left behind consisting for the most part of old men, is being mutilated and executed on false and trumped up charges. Many of the Jewish rabbis have been hanged in their places of worship. Against this background the work of our fraternal order stands in prominent contrast. Our efforts are based on the universal brotherhood of man and we bring succor to all wherever possible, regardless of race. We thank God tonight that we are American citizens and glory in our citizenship and we rejoice that God has placed at the helm of state a citizen whose calm and pacific citizenship has saved us and will continue to save us from disaster and war."

B'NAI B'RITH DAY.

B'nai B'rith day will be observed at the Panama Exposition Tuesday, April 27.

This event is fraught with much importance as it signified the unity of American Jewish life, and it is very much to be desired that there will be a large representation of this noble order present on that occasion.

It would also be well to have large numbers of our co-religionists who are not members of the order participate in the celebration.

The B'nai B'rith, which was organized in the early days of German Jewish immigration to this country, numbers within its ranks many thousand of representative Jews, both in this country, in Europe and in the Orient. Its philanthropic and educational endeavors have proved a great blessing to thousands of our co-religionists. It has been instrumental in caring for the widow, the orphan and the aged, and it has cemented a strong bond of union among its members, who are scattered in various parts of the world.

The Present and Future of D. G. L. No. 5

their faith is the dearer and nearer to them because they have suffered so much for it. And secondly, unspoiled as yet by too much ease and good fortune, they have the energy and strength that comes from effort, and the power which is gained from overcoming difficulty. I would not either blind myself or attempt to deceive others concerning the weaknesses and faults of this particular class, but I realize clearly that these failings are as it were, the shadow which inevitably accompanies the light; they are at once the result of external foreign and regrettable conditions, and at the same time to a large extent, indications of strength and power. With the full knowledge of facts as they are, and I believe a proper appreciation of what may be, as the head of the oldest and probably proudest Jewish community in this southland, nay, perhaps, because of that position, which better enables me to see the truth, I make the statement and venture the augury without the slightest hesitation, that the newcomers are they who will take up the burden of the District and of the Order, carrying it forward to newer and larger triumphs. In the spirit of the ideals of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith, "which has taken upon itself the task of uniting Israelites" in all large endeavors, for their own and the world's benefit, I would conclude with the exhortation that we of the present time recognize this truth and hold out our hands to our Jewish brethren, not in the miserable and hypocritical spirit of the self-complacent benevolence of condescending tolerance which flatters itself that it is doing a service to those it would help, but rather in the free, frank and full recognition of the fact that the Order and cause for which we stand are to be the real gainers thereby.

KAUFMAN HAYS.

On Tuesday, March 9, 1915, Mr. Kaufman Hays celebrated his eightieth birthday anniversary in a quiet manner, in the enjoyment of splendid health. Although he desired that his anniversary be not made the occasion of a public demonstration, he saw to it that the children of the Jewish Orphan Asylum, the inmates of the Home for the Aged and Infirm, and the little tots of the infants' Orphan's Home, and the inmates of the Orthodox Old Home participated in the joyous occasion by being served special dinners.

Mr. Hays has been identified with his home city since his arrival there in 1852. He is recognized as one of the leading citizens of Cleveland. As a Jew, Mr. Hays has identified himself with all movements tending to the elevation and betterment of his co-religionists. He is active in congregational affairs, a loyal and true member of the Order, and has filled many important positions of trust connected with charitable and educational institutions.

The B'nai B'rith News wishes Brother Hays "ad meoh shonim."

MASTERS OF FATE.

The things to learn are many,
  But truer there is none
Than that the day is incomplete
  Without my work well done.

What if I am not mighty?
  What if I cannot run?
God's great blue day is incomplete
  Without my work well done.

—William C. Gannett.

A RECOGNITION.

We quote from the concluding paragraph of the 14th annual report of the Industrial Removal Office as follows: "Grateful acknowledgement is made to all agencies, committees and individuals engaged in the work; and to the B'nai B'rith organization whose sustained cooperation has been as important a factor as in years gone by."

He that does good to another man does also good to himself; not only in the consequence, but in the very act of doing it, for the consciousness of well-doing is an ample reward.—Seneca.

MESSAGE OF THE PRESIDENT

To the Constitution Grand Lodge of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith in Convention Assembled

Five years have gone by since we last met. Great events have taken place in the world's history during that period, and there has been greater activity within the Order during that time than during any other like period in its history. To chronicle fully the work attempted and the work accomplished by the Order would make this report of such unusual length that I feel constrained to refer briefly only to some of the more important matters which have engaged our attention and efforts since the last convention.

During the past five years ending December 31, 1914, we instituted 70 lodges in the United States, 6 in the Dominion of Canada, 5 in Germany, 2 in Austria, 5 in Turkey, 4 in Bulgaria, 2 in Egypt, 2 in Palestine, 1 in Servia, 1 in Syria, 1 in Denmark, and 2 in England.

The total membership is now 40,083, an increase of 6,960 since we last met. District Grand Lodge No. 11, composed of the lodges in the Orient, has, during that time, been created. Great care was taken in the Orient to admit to membership only men of high standing in their respective communities. The establishment of the new lodges in the Orient and the new District Grand Lodge was accomplished through the efforts of the late Brother Siegmund Bergel, who also aided in the establishment of the lodge in Copenhagen.

Abrogation of the Russian Treaty.

For many years the persecution of the Jews in Russia had been growing from bad to worse. Remonstrances by the American press and from portions of the European press were of no avail. Massacres in Russia, instigated by the State and executed by its servants, were succeeded by a method of extermination, less spectacular but more effective than the public slaughter of inoffensive women and children. Other governments, when appealed to, took the position that they had no right to interfere in the internal affairs of Russia. The American government, from time to time, made representations concerning the treatment of American citizens of the Jewish faith when visiting Russia, but with very little effect. At our last convention, held in the City of Washington, the Hon. John B. Foster, formerly Secretary of State, bore witness to the disrespect shown to the American passport in Russia when presented by a Jew. He said:

> "Some years ago when I was about to sail to St. Petersburg to assume my duties as American Minister in Russia, I was told by one of my predecessors at that Court that one of my chief duties would be going to the foreign office to secure the release of American citizens of the Jewish faith from imprisonment, and this prediction was very nearly correct. In the eighties, when I had the honor to represent our country at the Court of the Czar, even the passport of the government of the United States commanded very little respect when it was found that it was borne by a member of the Hebrew race."

Soon after the convention was over the sentiment seemed to gain ground that there ought to be no commercial treaty with a country which refused to recognize the American passport, and it was urged that one nation has the right to interfere in the internal affairs of another when it appears that certain subjects of the former are inhumanely persecuted and oppressed.

On January 19, 1911, the delegates of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations met in the City of New York. At that meeting Mr. Louis Marshall read a paper advocating the abrogation of the commercial treaty entered into between the United States and Russia in 1832. The Conference appointed a committee to present the paper to the President of the United States. This was promptly attended to.

President Taft decided to hold a conference concerning the advisability of abrogating the treaty; after consulting with our Washington representative, Mr. Simon Wolf, as to whom to invite, the presidents of the B'nai B'rith, the Union of American Hebrew Congregations, and the American Jewish Committee, and two members of the Executive Board of each of said organizations, received on February 8, 1911, the following telegram from the President of the United States:

> "I am inviting conference of gentlemen at luncheon at the White House 1:30 February 15. There will be present, if they accept invitations, the following gentlemen, in addition to yourself (here follow the names of the other invited guests), also Secretary Knox and Secretary Nagel. Kindly wire me whether you can be present. WM. H. TAFT."

On February 15th, at the time indicated, there appeared at the White House Messrs. Wolf, Freiberg and Bettman, representing the Union of American Hebrew Congregations; Messrs. Jacob H. Schiff and Louis Marshall, representing the American Jewish Committee, and Messrs. Jacob Furth, Philip Stein and the writer, representing the B'nai B'rith. There were also present Mr. Charles Nagel, Secretary of Commerce and Labor, and Congressman Goldfogle. We were cordially received by the President and took luncheon with him and his family. After luncheon the meeting was held. The President excused the absence of Secretary Knox, who had been unexpectedly called to Chicago.

It may be said that as a result of the meeting we were all convinced that unless it could be demonstrated that public sentiment was with us the administration would be loath to act. It was therefore decided by us, Mr. Jacob H. Schiff taking the initiative, to appeal to public opinion. The success of that appeal will form part of the history of this country. From the extreme East, to the extreme West, and from the extreme North to the extreme South, the people, except those who had special money interests in Russia, were one in their demand that a treaty with any country which refused to give the full measure of respect due the American passport should be abrogated; that no question of dollars should be permitted to interfere with human rights.

It is with satisfaction that I record the fact that the appeal of our members to their Christian neighbors in the various communities and to the Legislatures of a number of States met with a ready and favorable response. In nearly all cities mass meetings were held denouncing Russia's course. Several States adopted resolutions requesting the Government to act. The press was almost a unit in demanding the abrogation of the treaty. Resolutions for abrogating the treaty were introduced in the House of Representatives as well as in the Senate and favorably considered by the Committee on Foreign Relations. The agitation began in the latter part of February and continued to the end of the year. Personally I believe that the President was in sympathy with our request at the time we met him at the White House, but that he then feared the country was not ripe for such action. On December 6th of that year he informed Mr. Simon Wolf and myself, when we called on him at the White House, that he would give notice of the abrogation of the treaty about Christmas time. The notice was given.

On January 6, 1912, at the annual banquet of the Chicago lodges given in celebration of B'nai B'rith Day, Secretary Nagel, who was the guest of honor, after delivering an address on "Immigration and Its Problems," presented to the writer, for the Order, the pen with which President Taft signed the Act of Abrogation of the Treaty of 1832. He said in part:

> "It is my privilege to hand you the pen with which the President of the United States signed the abrogation resolution. I trust that we may all remember that only the first step has been taken, that very much remains to be done, and I trust that we may bear in mind that there will be occasion enough for patience, firmness and wisdom."

After notice of the abrogation of the treaty was given it was reported that a new treaty might be entered into by which the right to ignore an American passport when in the hands of a Jew would in some indirect way be recognized. Brother Simon Wolf called President Taft's attention to this report in a letter bearing date November 22, 1912. The President replied to him as follows:

> "My Dear Mr. Wolf I have your letter of November 22nd, in which you refer to the reports that we are engaged in making temporary agreement with Russia to take place of the agreement which we have abrogated. I beg to assure you that we expect to make no agreement of this kind or any kind. What we have been doing is examining the existing treaties and statutes and international law applicable to a situation like that which will occur after our treaty with Russia of 1832 shall cease to be. We do not expect to change, by any agreement, or so-called modus vivendi, the status quo, which the abrogation of the treaty will leave on the first of January next by its ceasing to have effect."

What, if anything, was gained for the Jews in Russia by the abrogation of the treaty only the future will disclose. The United States Government having taken the position that its passport must give equal protection to all of its citizens is not likely to recede from that position.

Awarding of the Medals.

At the meeting of the Executive Committee of the Order held in Berlin in 1912, the awarding of the gold medal to "the man or woman, regardless of creed, who has contributed most during the year to the welfare of the Jewish cause," was for the first time considered. It was voted to the Honorable William H. Taft, President of the United States.

The Executive Committee next met in Washington, D. C., on January 5 and 6, 1913. An invitation was addressed to each member of the Committee to meet President Taft at a luncheon at the White House at 1:30 P. M. on January 6th. The invitation was accepted and we had the pleasure of being introduced to the President's family. After luncheon the gold medal was presented to President Taft. The address of presentation and the response thereto by President Taft will be found in the appendix to this report.

The President pinned the medal on his breast, sent for a photographer, and had a group picture taken of the assemblage, himself standing in the center.

The second medal was awarded by the Executive Committee at its meeting held in the city of Chicago on January 18, 1914, to Dr. Adolphe Stern of Bucharest, president of District Grand Lodge No. 9, in recognition of his many services to the cause of Israel. Dr. Stern made the following acknowledgment:

> "Nice, February 15, 1914.
> Highly Esteemed Grand President.
> Dear Colleague and Brother: Not till today did I receive the information that you have awarded me this year's medal. This high distinction filled me with joy and pride. It is not only a recognition of my humble efforts but also a mark of honor for our beloved order. For my first teacher was my never to be forgotten noble friend, Benjamin Franklin Piexotto, who was Grand Saar of the Order B'nai B'rith, and the Order has pointed out to me aim and direction for my life's work; it has given me inspiration and courage to take up the fight for freedom and justice. The Order which is a practical school of idealism furnished me instruction, example and suggestion. In the Order I find the quickening springs of my strength. The possibility of the individual man to be a necessary factor in the historical development of progress depends upon the social expedient, and this expedient is formed by our Order, which establishes a new, fruitful principle of human progress and unity by welding together our co-religionists of all lands, not for the purpose of exclusion and to work against humanity, but to join in its endeavors.
> Thus I become the humble instrument for conferring honor upon the Order.
> And still another thought may have guided you. The medal may be intended to serve not merely as a recognition of my activity in the past, but also as an encouragement to continue the work in the future.
> In that sense I accept the medal. As it honors the fighter, may it also prove a symbol for the victorious ending of the fight!
> Accept, highly esteemed Grand President and dear Brother, my sincerest thanks and my fraternal greeting.
>
> Your faithful and devoted Brother,
> DR. ADOLPHE STERN."

The awarding of the medal to Dr. Stern called forth from the General Committee of District Grand Lodge No. 9 a resolution of appreciation, which will be found in the appendix hereto.

The Constantinople Fire.

In the year 1911 Balat, a section of the city of Constantinople, inhabited principally by Jews, was destroyed by fire. The Executive Committee was informed by cable of the misery and suffering caused by the conflagration, and was appealed to for financial assistance. Upon receipt of the appeal the Executive Committee forthwith cabled funds so that immediate relief was received from the Order days before any relief came from the nearest European country. The total amount forwarded by the Executive Committee was over 23,000 francs.

Acknowledging receipt of the B'nai B'rith contribution for the relief of the fire sufferers District Grand Lodge No. 11, wrote:

> "By its quick and decisive action our Order has rendered humanity a noble service and it has also demonstrated to our Jewish brethren that in time of need and suffering the Order can be depended on for relief.
> 'Die Welt,' an organ published in Berlin, reported as follows:
> 'The names of the Hilfsverein der Deutschen Juden and the Order of B'nai B'rith, whose deeds of benevolence are really great, are on everybody's lips.' "

The Earthquake in Turkey.

In the summer of 1912 an earthquake destroyed a number of cities in European Turkey.

On August 21, 1912, the following cable was received from President Niego of District Grand Lodge No. 11:

> "B'nai B'rith, Chicago:
> Erdbeben Katastrophe ruinerte Judengemeinden. Loge Delegation Markus und Auerbach inspizierte Hilfsaktion dringend."

Immediately after the earthquake Dr. Israel Auerbach, Secretary of District Grand Lodge No. 11, on behalf of the Grand Lodge, investigated the conditions of the Jews living in the cities affected by the earthquake.

As representative of the Hilfsverein der Deutschen Juden, Rabbi Dr. Marcus joined Dr. Auerbach in the relief work. The Jewish section of the city of Gallipolli was almost entirely destroyed.

Upon receipt of the message advising of the disaster the Executive Committee forwarded by cable 2,500 france for relief. Later, we forwarded a further sum of 2,500 francs, which was contributed by the General Committees of the District Grand Lodges. A small balance remained on hand, which was turned over to the fund for the war sufferers of the Turkish and Balkan States.

Relief for Balkan War Sufferers.

In 1912 the war of Bulgaria, Servia, Greece and Montenegro against Turkey was fought and concluded, leaving in its wake much misery and distress. On Nov. 26th of that year we received a cable from Grand Lodge No. 11, "Hilfe dringend erbeten," also an appeal for aid from the Grand Rabbi of Turkey on behalf of our co-religionists in the Balkan States. We requested the lodges of the Order in America by wire to solicit donations for the sufferers and cabled a similar request to the European Grand Lodges. As a result of the appeal $25,618.09 was contributed by the American lodges. This amount was forwarded to the Presidents of District Grand Lodges Nos. 9 and 11, to be used by them for the relief of Jewish war sufferers. Incomplete reports show that the European Grand Lodges contributed an additional sum of $12,181.

Money from here was forwarded by cable and reached the sufferers ahead of contributions sent by any of the European organizations.

While the gathering of funds was in progress the Executive Committee was advised by the German Grand Lodge and Hilfsverein der Deutschen Juden that a conference for the discussion of relief measures for the war sufferers in the Balkan States would be held at Brussels in December, 1912. We were requested to co-operate and to delegate some one to represent us at the conference. The Executive Committee gave its approval to the holding of such conference and authorized Brother D. Jesselsohn, Vice-President of District Grand Lodge No. 8, to represent us. He attended the conference.

Relief for Flood Sufferers in Ohio and the Tornado Sufferers in Nebraska.

In March, 1913, several of the states in the United States suffered from a tornado and flood. We promptly wired $500.00 to Nebraska and $1,500.00 to Ohio, and were prepared to forward much larger sums, but a nation-wide collection was taken up, which was sufficient to cover existing needs.

Outrages on Jews in Saloniki.

On Nov. 21, 1912, Brother J. Niego, of Constantinople, President of District Grand Lodge No. 11, cabled as follows:

"Pera, Constantinople, Nov. 21, 1912.

B'nai B'rith, Chicago, Ill.: Saloniki pluendern Griechen Juedisches Stadtviertel, zerstoeren Synagoguen, schaenden Frauen, intervenieret Regierung energisch Athens. Deutsche Franzoesische Botschaften tun Gleiches.

NIEGO."

Upon receipt of the cablegram we sent a telegram to President Taft informing him of its contents and praying for the intervention of this government, jointly with one or more of the European governments.

An investigation was ordered by our Government.

A few days later the Charge d'Affaires of the Greek Legation in Washington was quoted in an interview in the Washington Post, published on Nov. 30, 1912, doubting the correctness of the Saloniki reports. He further stated that the Grand Rabbi of Saloniki in the name of all the Jews had written a letter to Prince Nicholas of Greece, commander-in-chief of Saloniki, expressing indignation at the calumnies spread regarding the treatment of Jews in that city and officially declaring that since Greek authority was established in Saloniki the Greeks had done all in their power for the protection of all creeds and especially for the Jews.

In view of the fact that since the Greek occupation thousands of Jews have left Saloniki for Turkish territory the alleged letter of the Grand Rabbi of Saloniki, if any such was written, must be taken rather as the expression of a hope than as the statement of a fact.

Order's Efforts on Behalf of Jews in Balkan States.

At the outbreak of the Turkish war it was foreseen that territorial rearrangement would most likely follow as a result of the war and that thereby the status of the Jews in some of the Balkan States would, probably, change for the worse.

With the approval of the Executive Committee the following cable was sent to the First Lodge of England, London:

"Kindly consider advisability of appealing to British government in case it participates in settlement of Balkan states to urge equal rights for all subjects regardless of religious creeds."

Another cable on the same subject was sent to London Lodge on December 30, 1912.

Resolutions prepared by us, expressing the sentiment of the people of the State of Illinois, that all inhabitants of the Balkan States be accorded equal rights regardless of religious belief, were submitted to the Illinois Legislature. The resolutions were unanimously adopted on April 2, 1913, and it was ordered that a certified copy be forwarded to the Secretary of State. The resolutions were as follows:

"Whereas, Human rights have been disregarded in Roumania and Turkey, in that Christians have been massacred by the [illegible] in Albania and more than [illegible] Jews in Roumania are reduced by governmental restriction as to the enjoyment of their natural rights to a condition which is equivalent to slavery; and

Whereas, In the Bulgarian territory all of the people thereof have been heretofore permitted to enjoy and are now enjoying equal rights and privileges; and

Whereas, Roumania is now demanding that in the distribution of territory resulting from the [illegible] war a portion of Bulgarian territory be ceded to Roumania; and

Whereas, The cession of Roumania of such territory would bring a hitherto free people under and subject to the unjust restrictions of the Roumanian government unless the rights of such people are properly safeguarded; and

Whereas, It is contrary to the enlightened judgment of just men everywhere that any people should be made the victims of massacre and of discrimination and unjust laws.

Therefore, Be it resolved by the Senate of the State of Illinois, the House of Representatives concurring therein, That it is the sense of the people of the State of Illinois and their hope that the powers of Europe should and that they will demand as a condition precedent to the division of cession of any such territory, that the human rights of all the inhabitants thereof, whether Christians, Jews or Moslems, be fully guarded and protected. Resolved, further, That the Department of State of the United States Government be informed of this action and requested to take such measures in the premises as it may deem proper and just."

We caused a successful appeal to be made to leading newspapers of the country for editorial endorsement of our position, that the Jews in territory to be ceded to Roumania should not be deprived of the rights of citizenship theretofore enjoyed by them.

We petitioned our government to suggest to the Powers, that in the peace agreement a clause be incorporated guaranteeing equal rights to the inhabitants of the Balkan States regardless of creed.

Our appeal to President Wilson and Secretary Bryan was not made in vain. At the peace conference of the Balkan delegates, held in Bucharest, in August, 1913, a note was presented from the American government expressing the hope that in the treaty to be consummated, full religious liberty and citizenship to all the inhabitants in territory which should be taken from one country and given to another, would be granted.

Premier Majorescu, of Roumania, presiding at the conference, declared that it was not necessary to have such a declaration incorporated in the treaty as such was already the law in all of the countries involved. With this statement all the delegates coincided. As we well now, the measure of liberty and citizenship that is accorded to the Jews of Roumania, the action of the delegates at the conference was to us a disappointment.

Upon being informed of this action taken by the conference on the American note, the following communication was sent to the Secretary of State:

"Chicago, Aug. 9, 1913.

Hon. W. J. Bryan, Washington, D. C.

Dear Sir: According to the news reports, your appeal for equal rights to the inhabitants of the Balkan states, regardless of creed, did not meet with the measure of success which it deserved, and which was so ardently hoped for it by the sufferers in at least one of the countries in question.

Such result, while it may temporarily disappoint, does not discourage those who are patiently waiting, and those who are prayerfully watching and hoping for the day that will witness the principle you advocated in universal operation among civilized men; for it is a part of their philosophy to regard every effort in the right direction as a step farther toward the ultimate attainment of that fundamental justice, which to be more fully accorded needs only to be better understood.

Your position on this question as Secretary of State of this great nation reflects credit on you as well as upon the State. The names of those in power who stand up for the rights of man will live and be held in grateful remembrance long after they are gone.

Please permit me to express to you on behalf of the organization I represent, as well as personally, our very great appreciation of your action in the premises.

Very truly yours,
ADOLPH KRAUS."

Mr. Bryan subsequently issued a formal statement paraphrasing his note, saying that he received vigorous representations from Jews, all over the country, against the treatment of their coreligionists in the Balkan States and especially in Roumania; that several committees of prominent Jews called on him and that with the committee was Brother Simon Wolf, formerly president of the B'nai B'rith and that it was because of the fair representations of these committees that he dispatched the note to Bucharest.

Although the answer to the American note was not satisfactory, some hope, even though feeble, may be found in the public and formal assurance of the Roumanian minister of foreign affairs, that a day may come for the complete emancipation of the Jew in that country.

Situation in Roumania.

After much labor on the part of Dr. Adolphe Stern, President of District Grand Lodge No. 9, aided by many prominent members of the Order in Roumania, notably among them Brother Rev. Dr. Niemirower, of Jassy, the thirty years' agitation for the abolition of the humiliating oath of "More Judaico," which was administered to Jews in judicial proceedings came to an end. The Court of Cassation, the highest authority in the land, issued a decree forbidding the administration of the "More Judaico" to Jewish witnesses.

The general situation of the Jews in Roumania is still more deplorable. Although minor concessions have at one time or another been granted by the authorities, and in a few individual cases full citizenship has been granted to Jews, the great body of Jews still suffers under the oppressive laws specially created to discriminate against them and aimed to prevent them from following many occupations and vocations, thereby closing to them the door of opportunity and cutting off the means of earning a livelihood. They are even prohibited from gathering in conference to devise means of protecting themselves against the inhuman treatment to which they are subjected. Jewish doctors are prohibited from following their profession, factories are prohibited from employing Jewish clerks and Jewish engineers, Christian labor unions have been subsidized to drive Jewish workmen out of the labor market. . . .

Beilis Trial.

It seemed hardly possible that in these enlightened times a Jew should be imprisoned and compelled to fight for his liberty against all the machinery and the active influence of a powerful government upon the old and oft-exploded charge of ritual murder. Yet such was the experience of Mendel Beilis, and it need hardly be stated that the Russian Government was his prosecutor.

When the priest Justinus Elisejovitch Pranaitis, who described himself as the Magister of Theology and Roman Catholic Diocesian of the Turkestan province, testified at the trial that Jews use the blood of Christian children at Passover, the writer sent the following cablegram to Pope Pius X. at Rome:

"The undersigned, on behalf of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith, an international organization, counting among its membership the foremost Jewish citizens and subjects of the various civilized countries of the world, respectfully petitions that Your Holiness may find it consistent with Your Holiness' world-known love of truth and justice to proclaim in such public manner as your Holiness may prescribe, that the great church, over which Your Holiness presides, recognizes that the ritual murder accusation against the Jew has no foundation in the precepts or practices of Judaism; to the end that the weight of Your Holiness' word may overcome the ignorance and superstition through which millions are made to suffer, and thus aid in bringing peace on earth to men of good will.

ADOLF KRAUS."

Lord Rothschild, of London, addressed a letter on the same subject to His Eminence Raphael Cardinal Palatine, Merry del Val, Pontificial Secretary of State, which letter and the Cardinal's answer thereto, as well as an answer of Cardinal J. Gibbons, of Baltimore, to a letter written by a member of the Order will be found in the appendix, so as to make a record thereof in permanent form.

Equal Rights for Jews.

At the last convention of the Order a resolution was adopted declaring that the Order should devote its energies toward securing freedom and equality of rights and opportunity for Jews in every land. The mover of the resolution attended by invitation one of the meetings of the Executive Comimttee and ably presented his views.

It may, with propriety, he said that all of the energies of the Order are, and for some time have been, aimed more or less directly at this subject. The events and the conditions which have called forth the efforts of the Order to relieve the sufferings of our co-religionists, are closely related to the denial of equal rights and opportunities to our people in those countries where our aid has been most required. The Order has lost no opportunity to point out and to emphasize publicly this connection. It is even now working through diplomatic channels, which effort, there is reason to hope, will lead to the betterment of the condition of our people in the lands in which they are oppressed.

The terrible European war which has caused so much hatred, misery, and misfortune, may, when peace is declared, also bring peace and enjoyment of human rights to our unfortunate brethren, who for so long a time have lived in fear that, like defenseless animals, they would be maimed and killed solely to furnish sport devoid of all danger to the inhuman hunter. We have obtained the assurance that at least one government will at the peace conference be found to be the advocate of the rights of men.

Anti-Defamation League.

For many years one of the most active committees in District Grand Lodge No. 6 was the Publicity Committee, of which Brother Sigmund Livingston was chairman. Its work was similar to that now undertaken by the Anti-Defamation League, but on a smaller scale. It is to the work of that Publicity Committee that we are indebted for the idea of forming the Anti-Defamation League.

An organization meeting was held in October, 1913, in Chicago, to which about fifteen of the most prominent of our brethren in that city were invited. At that meeting it was arranged that the League should be formed and that it should have a representative in every important city of the country. A list of about 150 persons was made up, letters were sent to these notifying them that they had been appointed members of the executive committee of the League, and with one or two exceptions, all enthusiastically accepted the appointment and pledged their active co-operation. The newspapers at the time also manifested quite a lively interest in the plan, and through our clipping service we found that the organization of the League had been given wide-spread publicity throughout the country.

The first few months were devoted largely to the organization and to the preparation of standards, which would succinctly state the general scope of the League's work and the nature of its policy. After a careful consideration of the various plans submitted, a committee was appointed to draft the "Principles." This draft was then printed and submitted to each of the members of the League, with a request for suggestions and amendments. After all the members of the Executive Committee had registered their opinions it was again submitted to a sub-committee, which carefully considered the suggestions presented and prepared the final draft of the "Principles," which have since governed the League in its activities. . . .

Considerable progress has been made in carrying out the programs thus outlined. In its campaign for members the Committee decided that a different system should be followed in the case of Jewish members from that to be used in soliciting the co-operation of non-Jews. With relation to the former, a letter was sent to each of the lodges, accompanied by membership lists, requesting that the lodges appoint committees to solicit members from among those Jews of the community who were not members of the B'nai B'rith. It was also the consensus of opinion that non-Jews should not be requested to join, unless their position in the community was such and their attitude toward the Jews sufficiently well known as to make their co-operation an asset.

It soon became evident, however, from the large amount of work before the Committee and from the results achieved, that the gathering of a large membership was unnecessary in order that effective results might be secured. Though an extensive membership was considered desirable, it was decided that it would be better for the present at least to devote time and attention to ameliorate conditions rather than to extend the propaganda for membership. Furthermore, the desirability of conducting the work economically dictated the expenditure of the funds at our disposal for the accomplishment of results along the lines laid down in the "Principles," rather than in the gathering of a large membership. Notwithstanding this fact, however, the movement had been given such publicity in the newspapers that for several months the League continued to receive applications for membership from men and women, Jewish and non-Jewish, in all walks of life. Among those who became members in this way are many of the most prominent publicists, writers, college professors, statesmen and church dignitaries of the country. Further, many organizations, without appeal from us, adopted resolutions endorsing the work of the League.

The success of the movement and the enthusiastic co-operation of the members led the Managing Board, some months later, to extend the influence of the work and an additional list of names for Committee members was made up to cover those sections of the country not previously covered. There are at the present time, therefore, about 200 members of the Committee distributed in practically every state of the country.

In some centers it was thought desirable to have local advisory committees organized. Thus far such committees have been organized in about a dozen of the larger cities of the United States.

No attempt will be made in this report to give a detailed statement of the work of the League since its organization, as that is covered in detail in the report of the chairman. Suffice it to say here that its activities have been diversified and, in the main, successful. Progress has been made along most of the lines mentioned in the "Principles," and in some directions the work has been practically completed. Thus, for example, the League succeeded in modifying the policy of the motion picture manufacturers, so that it is now very seldom that we have any cause to make complaint. Most of the secular newspapers are now free from defamatory references to the Jew, and the sectarian papers are adopting a much more liberal tone. Conditions on the vaudeville stage also have been materially improved.

With the authorities managing public schools sentiment has been aroused against the use of text-books which tend to instill or increase prejudice against the Jew, and in a large number of cities the use of improper books has been discontinued.

A great number of miscellaneous cases of individual oppression or defamation have been considered by the Managing Board, which meets every week in Chicago. The Board has given close attention and study to every matter submitted and has at all times exercised great care and discretion. In all cases appeals have been made to the sense of justice of those offending and in no instance have the bounds of propriety been overstepped.

For some years the number of summer resorts and private schools which advertise that Jews are not wanted has been growing in this country. We could well ignore this were it not for the fact that such advertisements aid in spreading prejudice and do not make for the welfare of our country. We know that no self-respecting Jew has any desire to be accepted as a guest at such a resort or to have his children attend such a school. It is the objectionable advertising we desire to stop. The League has prepared a Bill to be introduced in Congress providing that no book, pamphlet, paper, writing, print, manuscript or letter intended or calculated to discriminate or actually discriminating against any religious sect, class or denomination, or any member thereof in the matter of furnishing or neglecting or refusing to furnish them any lodging, housing, schooling, tuition, or any accommodation, privilege, or convenience offered to or enjoyed by the general public, shall be carried in the mail. The Bill further provides a penalty of a fine of not less than $100 and not more than $1,000, or imprisonment for not less than 30 days nor more than one year, for any person who shall knowingly deposit or cause to be deposited for mailing or delivery any of the above mentioned articles or things.

We hope that Congress will enact it into law.

The League's influence has had the tendency to change the point of view of the general public toward the Jew. It has so far, to some extent at least, aroused public opinion among both Jews and non-Jews against those who had attempted to slander our people. A number of Catholic newspapers have commented favorably upon our work and have called upon Catholic societies to follow our example.

Much important work, however, remains to be done, work which, if this Convention orders it to be continued and if it be carried out as conscientiously, energetically and with proper restraint and care as has been attempted so far, will surely prove to be of lasting good to all Jews for generations yet to come.

Seventieth Anniversary of the Institution of the Order.

Throughout the American Districts and in many lodges of the European Districts the seventieth anniversary of the institution of the Order was celebrated by public meetings as well as by special meetings in the lodge rooms. Noteworthy among these celebrations was the one arranged under the auspices of District Grand Lodge No. 1, which took the form of a public meeting at Temple Beth El, on Sunday evening, Jan. 19, 1913, in the city of New York. The occasion was honored by the presence of the President of the United States. The Temple was specially decorated and was filled to overflowing. Thousands desiring admission were unable to enter. The audience contained many distinguished men and women, and prominent officials of the city. Addresses were delivered by President Taft, Brothers Simon Wolf, Dr. Joseph Silverman, Dr. Samuel Schulman, and Charles Stern, then president of District Grand Lodge No. 1. . . .

Meetings of European Members of Executive Committee.

At the Berlin meeting of the Executive Committee of the Order it was suggested that the European members of the Executive Committee hold meetings, at least once every two years. Brother Dr. Berthold Timendorfer was appointed chairman with authority to call such meetings.

The first of these conferences was held in Berlin, Jan. 31, 1914. Representatives of Grand Lodges Nos. 8 and 10 also attended.

The conference was called principally to adopt precautionary measures in view of religious and political antagonism which then raged in European jurisdictions, especially in Germany. It was resolved that the Order, through its District Grand Lodges, continue to observe strict neutrality on political and religious questions.

The following subjects were also considered: the relief fund; interchange of official periodicals of the Districts; employment of Galician Jews in the mines and smelter works; attitude of the Districts in international relief work; mixed marriages and lodge membership; employment bureaus; children's resorts; the internal and external problems of the Order; and the question of preparing the history of the Order for the seventy-fifth anniversary of its existence. An agreement was reached by the German and Austrian Districts to deliberate jointly hereafter on important questions.

International Hygiene Exposition.

Under the protection of the King of Saxony an International Hygienic Exhibition was held in the city of Dresden in 1911. A special section was set aside for the exhibit of the hygiene of the Jews. We were invited to send exhibits. We forwarded exhibits from the Cleveland Orphan Asylum, the Atlanta Jewish Orphan Home, and a complete model of the National Jewish Hospital for Consumptives. The European District Grand Lodges also participated. Exhibits of all sorts tending to depict Jewish life with reference to the practice of charity in its broadest sense were shown. . . .

The Educational League.

A plan for the affiliation of the Educational League with the Order was presented at the last convention. The Convention resolved to adopt the plan of co-operation, with certain amendments, and also empowered the Executive Committee to appropriate annually in its discretion a sum, not to exceed five cents for each member of the American Districts, for the uses and purposes of the Educational League.

The Executive Committee issued a circular advising the lodges and their members of the action taken by the Order in the furtherance of the aims of the League, and requested them to bring to the attention of the League all cases of talented orphans who require financial assistance to obtain a higher education.

The Executive Committe has so far not been called upon by the League to contribute to its maintenance.

Your attention is invited to the report which will be submitted to you by the League. . . .

Appeals for Aid.

The attention of the Executive Committee of the Order was called to the numerous appeals for financial assistance which are received by our lodges from many organizations. The Committee adopted a resolution requesting lodges to refuse to consider appeals for assistance other than local, unless such requests come from or are approved by the Executive Committee of the Order, a District Grand Lodge, or General Committee of a District Grand Lodge. Many worthy Jewish organizations in this as well as other countries appeal to us for aid whenever they need or think they need financial assistance. Our lodges have many demands made upon them by the Order and as our scope of usefulness increases our wants increase. It is praiseworthy to aid in taking care of other people's children, but the first duty is to see that our own do not starve. Contributions by our members as individuals to all proper causes I would encourage, but I am inclined to favor a law prohibiting lodges from using lodge funds for any purpose outside of the needs of the Order, local needs excepted.

Relief Work of German and Austrian Lodges During the War.

The report of Direktor Hecht, Secretary of District Grand Lodge No. 10, covers a period from the beginning of the war to Dec. 15, 1914, and is in part as follows:

"Naturally the war in which our Fatherland is involved has given a decided direction to all of our humanitarian activities or rather it has impressed an indelible stamp of its own upon our work. Our District has devoted its best efforts to aid and assist the war sufferers to such an extent as to secure the commendation of the governmental (state and local) authorities and of interested private parties to an extraordinary degree.

The lodges did not content themselves with the contribution of considerable sums of money from their own resources for local requirements, regardless of creed or nationality. The lodges and their members have, according to their ability, and in keeping with the duties imposed upon them by their social position, contributed large sums to the "Red Cross" Society and other institutions for the public welfare. It is impossible now to establish the total amount of such donations, as the brothers, through modesty and innate delicacy, contributed large amounts without taking the larger public into their confidence. Others of our members have assumed the obligation to contribute liberal stated amounts monthly during the entire duration of the war.

Besides the money contributions nearly all of our brothers have sent gifts of necessities and luxuries to our soldiers now serving in the army. You may obtain a conception of the money value of these gifts, when I inform you, that one member of Eintracht Lodge has supplied 20.000 Viennese soldiers with cigarettes, handkerchiefs, knives, writing paper, chocolate and many other desirable articles. For the shipment thereof 85 large packing cases were required.

Not only did our members thus cheerfully sacrifice both money and property, but what is being appreciated to a far greater extent is the fact that they have devoted themselves, their wives and grown-up children to the patriotic activities necessitated by the war. Without the least danger of being accused of exaggeration it can be safely stated, that wherever our Lodges are organized our members and their wives take the lead in all matters relating to war aid, that they in most cases took the initiative in organizing the several aid departments and are continuing the work most energetically and successfully, so that the government authorities have endowed these organizations with official executive powers and is not only co-operating with these organizations, but it is actually carrying on its own work in that field through them.

It would be impossible to mention all of the numerous activities of our Lodges in this report. I shall have to confine myself to mentioning only the most important thereof.

All the Lodges have taken a prominent part in caring for and assisting the refugees.

The Austria-Bielitz Lodge has tendered its vacation home to the Red Cross Society for use as a hospital for convalescents. It has admitted some fifty Christian children to its free boarding house in addition to the number of Jewish children who are regularly fed there.

The Union-Pilsen is doing most excellent work in supplying free food and refreshments at the various railroad stations within its district. The expense of this enterprise has so far reached 20,000-Kr. Furthermore this Lodge has distributed more than 40,000 garments.

The Solidaritas-Krakau has taken charge of all the diversified Jewish aid societies and is carrying on the work thereof in an exceptional manner.

The Bohemia-Prague, whose president, Dr. Heller, unfortunately at this moment is interned as a prisoner of war on the Island of Corsica, upon the outbreak of the war organized on a large scale a bureau to take care of the working men and employees, regardless of their religious affiliations, thrown out of employment through the war. This bureau, wherein the Mayor of the city and other officials are deeply interested, is managed exclusively by the Lodge. Furthermore this Lodge has donated a large amount to the Red Cross Society and is devoting the sum of 7,000-Kr. monthly to the support of refugees.

The Karlsbad-Karlshad has contributed 7,000 Kronen to the aid work in that city. It has taken care of the many Russian Jews, who were stranded there, not being able to return to their homes. Bro. Moser has placed his home at the disposal of the wounded soldiers. In spite of the general business depression, all of our brothers, who are at the head of industrial enterprises, keep their plants running at full capacity in order to avoid any increase of distress through the discharge of employees.

The Philanthropia-Reichenberg takes a prominent part in all the humanitarian institutions in its city.

The Wien and Eintracht, both of Vienna, have joined forces. Independent of the large sums they have contributed to other institutions, particularly to the Red Cross Society; they have instituted tea rooms, kindergartens, eating houses and sewing circles, and by these means they prevent much distress among the many people out of work.

The Moravia-Bruenn has contributed large sums of money. Besides this it has completely furnished its meeting rooms as a hospital and turned them over to the local authorities and it bears the entire expense of maintaining the hospital. The free board society founded and maintained by the Lodge feeds daily 500 children, whose providers are in the army service or who are in want owing to the exceptional conditions. It goes without saying, that this charity is carried on regardless of religion or nationality.

The Silesia-Troppau is taking a most active and generous part in all the charitable institutions of that city. It has secured Austrian citizenship for the large number of Russian workingmen and artisans, who have lived so many years in Silesia without being able to acquire that boon. By the use of its influence with the government authorities the Lodge has also succeeded in securing the legalizing of the ritual marriages, that are of such frequent occurrence among this class of Jews.

The Leopolis-Lemberg unfortunately was prevented from active work, as that city at the very beginning of the war had become a battle ground and a large number of the Jewish residents were forced to seek safety in flight.

The same applies to the Orient-Czernowitz.

The Allianz-Budweiss shared in all the aid work in that city. This Lodge has furnished the largest percentage of brothers serving in the army.

The Freundschaft-Teplitz immediately after the outbreak of hostilities placed its vacation home with 57 beds at the disposal of the Red Cross Society for use as a hospital.

Even if, like all other centers, the brothers took an active share in all the aid work, in this case the women are deserving of special mention for the interest they have displayed. They not only supervised the acquisition of the beds, linen, woolen and other materials needed, but they also took care that all the sewing and other work was given to poor and unemployed girls so that in this manner it proved of double humanitarian value and beneficence.

I must not omit mentioning, that from all of our Lodges a considerable number of our brothers have been called into active service and are now with the armies in the field. Nearly all of our brothers who are physicians or surgeons who have not been detailed for army service, have volunteered their services to the Fatherland.

A special occasion of rejoicing for both of the Vienna Lodges was the dedication of the Toynbee Hall and the children's home, organized and maintained by Eintracht Lodge. This dedication took place on November 15th and it proved a most impressive and solemn affair. Besides a large number of our brethren there were present the official representatives of both state and local administration. This institution, a visible token of the humanitarian work of our Order, will contribute largely to the strengthening of the esteem it enjoys with our fellow citizens."

Brother ex-President Maxmilian Stein, of Berlin, reports on the activities of the lodges in Germany. I quote from his report in part:

"A memorable meeting of the four Berlin Lodges took place August 12, 1914. At that meeting the creation of a War Aid Committee was decided on. The most noteworthy accomplishment of the Committee may properly be claimed to be the creation of our model hospital which has been installed in our lodge building at 10 Kleiststr. Since the opening of the hospital we have had charge of the care and attendance of 120 wounded soldiers daily. The chief medical director of the general staff, the inspecting army surgeons and the volunteer medical corps have repeatedly expressed their admiration at the complete installation, the organization and the maintenance of the hospital. . . . According to our Lodge Ritual the visiting and nursing of the sick is one of our most privileged duties. The love, the devotion and the readiness to bring sacrifices that have brought about the organization of our war hospital signify a specially meritorious page in the history and the activity of our Berlin Lodges.

Our Order is based upon the altruistic principle of always doing for others rather than to be thinking of self. The care and maintenance of our own brothers and their families becomes for us the highest and most important duty imposed by the Order. For this purpose a special fund of 100,000 Mark has been contributed from the treasuries of the Lodges. This fund serves to assist all such brothers as need help owing to the vicissitudes of the war. A special corps of women nurses has been organized to serve during the war. Another special committee has been created whose members are ready to assist those families whose providers are serving in the army. The installation of our war eating house in the Toynbee Hall by our Berlin Lodges might be considered as one of our happiest inspirations. The existing public eating houses and soup kitchens were unable to take care of and feed all the hungry. At our (Kosher) eating house, Gips St. 12 A, we offer the needy each day a good meal which costs us 40 Pf. We charge the visitors 10 Pf. and all those unable to pay even that nominal sum are furnished the meal without any payment. The War Aid Committee grants to the war eating house a monthly subsidy of 1,500 Mark. The Red Cross Society in recognition of the scope of the undertaking has also granted the eating house a subsidy of 3,000 Marks. During the month of September the eating house furnished a total number of 8,864 hot meals, making a daily average of 355 meals. During October the total reached 14,000 meals, or a daily average of 450. Since then the number of needy fed daily at the Toynbee Hall has materially increased. We aim to maintain this war eating house at a higher level than the ordinary soup kitchen and consider it socially on a much higher plane.

The War Aid Committee met one of the most severe and difficult tasks in providing the necessary assistance for poor Jewish refugees from East Prussia. The immediate expense of supporting 260 poor families required large sums of money. The recital of the atrocities committed upon these poor people who were driven from their homes and robbed of all their possessions are heart-rending. We will secure additional means required for the necessary assistance of these and other war sufferers and refugees. We must do our part in providing for the widows and orphans of those soldiers who gave up their lives in defense of the Fatherland and we cannot refuse to participate in any of the numerous duties imposed upon us and all others by the effects of this terrible war. To a large extent the War Aid Committee has devoted time and money to the forwarding of gifts of food, clothing and delicacies to the brothers on the battle fields. In comparison with the results shown by other societies and organizations the efficiency of our Berlin Lodges and of all the Lodges of the District is admitted to be of a superior merit.

Through the spirit pervading our Order and from its lofty teachings our Lodges have developed a large-hearted, liberal and manifold activity which fosters the power, the strength and the ability of our large organization and at the same time displays in the best light the high minded sentiments and the willingness to bear burdens and make sacrifices for our brothers and sisters. Let us hope that the War Aid Committee may at an early day be reconstituted as a peace committee, and that the Order of B'nai B'rith may soon be permitted to resume its ideal purposes under the blessings of a lasting peace. As long as the hardships of this cruel war require it we shall aim to heal the wounds and ally the suffering to the extent of our power and means. We shall attempt to do our full duty with our entire heart, our whole soul and with all our means.

In Germany each Lodge has appointed guardians for all families of members where the father, son, or son-in-law is serving in the army. It is the duty of these guardians to make due inquiry as to the condition of those left behind and wherever needed to inaugurate full relief measures. The various labor bureaus of the Lodges are making special efforts to secure employment for those in need of it. About 100,000 Mark has been contributed by the several Lodges to the Red Cross; thirty B'nai B'rith nurses, fully equipped, were tendered the Marine Hospital at Kiel on August 18th. The vacation colonies located at Hirschberg, at Elman and at Norderney were turned over to the military authorities. It was resolved that for all of the families of members who became impoverished on account of the war the Grand Lodge should defray all expenses connected with taking temporary care of them.

Lessing Lodge of Breslau, at its expense, furnishes refreshments at the railroad depots and turned over its lodge rooms to the government. Erfurt Lodge turned over its lodge rooms for a home for 50 children and takes care of them.

The lodges of the District contributed 75,000 Mark to the Grand Lodge which fitted out and furnished a hospital train and presented it to the government. It is officially known as the Hospital Train of the German B'nai B'rith Lodges.

Glueckauf Lodge presented 50 beds and the necessary equipment for a field hospital to the Red Cross. This is known as the Red Cross Lazarette of Gueckauf Lodge.

Berend-Lebman Lodge of Halberstadt turned its lodge rooms into a public kitchen and maintains it.

Duesseldorf Lodge furnished two war nurses with full equipment for the Red Cross. It established a public kitchen at which 120 persons are furnished food daily free of charge.

The Grand Lodge appropriated 1,000 Francs to the Red Crescent.

Fraternitas Lodge of Dresden gave up its vacation colonies for hospital purposes. The Ladies Auxiliary of the Lodge takes care of 100 poor children daily and the club rooms of the lodge have been turned into a temporary home for children. They also furnish refreshments to the soldiers and refugees at the railroad depots free of charge. The lodge also contributed 1,000 Mark to aid Galician refugees.

Friedens Lodge of Ratibor turned its lodge rooms into a hospital and tendered it to the war department.

The Lodge of Luebeck established and [illegible] a small hospital with 12 beds, fully equipped.

Carl Friedrich Lodge of Karlsruhe turned over its lodge rooms to the Red Cross for a hospital.

One of the most beautiful club buildings in Europe owned by the Berlin Lodges and lately erected at a cost of three million Marks has been transformed into a public hospital by the lodges.

Frankfurt Lodge turned its Home for Girls into a shelter for homeless women and its beautiful club into an asylum for homeless men.

Freiheits Lodge of Oppeln turned its lodge rooms into a hospital."

Similar report of activities reached us concerning Julius Bien Lodge, Toleranz Lodge, Sinai Lodge, Amicitia Lodge, Nassau Lodge, Victoria Lodge, Borussia Lodge, Mendelssohn Lodge, Kant Lodge and Dalbert Lodge.

Relief Measures by the Executive Committee.

In August, 1914, we received the following cable signed by Prof. Ehrman, President of the District Grand Lodge No. 10, and Dr. Kohn, Vice-President:

> "Die Oesterreichischen B'nai B'rith appellieren an ihre Amerikanischen Brueder um das Volk des freien Amerika aufzuklaeren ueber die Bedeutung des Riesenkampfes den Oesterreich-Ungarn fuer die Freiheit Europas und der gesammten Menschheit auszukaempfen hat. Es ist ein Kampf der Freiheit gegen Sklaverei, der Wahrheit gegen Luege und Betrug. Machen sie der nationalen Presse klar dass es sich um das Schicksal der alten Welt handelt. Wer Oesterreichischer Staatsbuerger ist, eile zu den Waffen, um fuer die Millionen unserer grausam bedrueckten und verfolgten Glaubensbrueder zu fechten. Jeder moege beisteuern zur Pflege und Heilung unserer in diesem schwersten aller Kriege verwundeten und kranken Helden aller Konfessionen und Voelker Oesterreich-Ungarns. Wir sind sicher dass unsere Bitte erhoert wird."

On Sept. 1st we notified the lodges to appoint committees to be ready to solicit contributions as soon as the call for help would reach us. The German cable having been cut and most of the American mail censored in England, it resulted in the fact that our correspondents in Germany and Austria failed to receive some of our messages and those which they did receive did not reach them for several weeks. We also failed to receive a number of messages and letters from those countries.

The Austrian government forwarded by wireless to its Ambassador in Washington at the request of the Austrian Grand Lodge the following dispatch:

> "Bitte nochmals dringend Sammlungen fuer unsere verwundeten und kranken Soldaten und fuer die Masse hungernder galizianischer Fluechtlinge fuer Oesterreichisches Rotes Kreuz und Fuersorgeaktion.
> EHRMANN."

It was handed to us by the Austrian Consul in Chicago on Sept. 25th. On Sept. 29th we mailed to our lodges an urgent appeal to make collections from among their members. On Oct. 12th we followed it up with a reminder. This part of the report is written more than six months after the first appeal for funds was issued, and even now a number of lodges have not finished nor reported their collections. Such a system of furnishing relief cannot be satisfactory to us and is surely very inadequate for furnishing relief in cases of necessity. The following contributions were received up to March 31, 1915:

From District No. 1	$ 10,677.82
From District No. 2	21,756.70
From District No. 3	4,576.75
From District No. 4	11,299.24
From District No. 5	4,156.02
From District No. 6	27,226.94
From District No. 7	12,212.68
The Executive Committee contributed	10,000.00
Total	$101,906.16

We cabled the following amounts:

To [illegible]	110,000 Kronen
To Copenhagen	2,000 Kroner
To Germany	70,000 Mark
To London	2,615 Dollars
To Palestine	55,000 Francs
To Russia	20,000 Rubels
To Serbia	10,000 Francs
To Turkey	45,000 Francs
To Greece	3,000 Francs

The remainder of the collection has been appropriated to be distributed among the sufferers of Austria, Germany, Russia and the Orient.

The bulk of our collections was forwarded to Europe before any general relief campaigns were undertaken by our [illegible] in this country. Anticipating that a relief committee would be formed, knowing that the distress was unparalleled in history, believing that such organizations could raise a larger fund than we could alone and desiring that as much money should be raised as possible, we limited our request for collections to our own members. Our collections were intended to relieve immediate distress. It was expected that substantial sums would be collected by the other united Jews. We have informed the other organizations engaged in the collection of funds as to how we distributed our collections so that they would be in a position to govern themselves accordingly.

Emergency Trust Fund.

At the Executive Committee meeting [illegible] held in Berlin, Germany, in 1912, the proposition was submitted that all the members of the Order, irrespective of the fact that some belong to Districts that are exempt from payment of Constitution Grand Lodge dues, be required to pay a stipulated sum annually, such money to be set aside by the District Grand Lodges as a relief fund in cases of emergency and to be subject to the order of the Executive Committee.

The following resolution was adopted at that meeting:

> "Resolved: That the Executive Committee expresses the wish that a general fund of the Order be created; that a sub-committee consisting of the President of the Order, Brother Philip Stein, and Brother Charles Hartman be appointed to work out the requisite plan for submission to and approval of the various District Grand Lodges; and that such plan be introduced for action at the next Convention of the Order to be held in the year 1915."

The proposition was submitted to the various District Grand Lodges. District No. 2, prior to the action of the Executive Committee, passed a law requiring each member of the District to pay $1.00 to the Grand Lodge, the money to be used for emergency and relief purposes.

District No. 6 adopted the suggestion and is now collecting annual dues from the members for an emergency fund.

District No. 8 enacted a law whereby one Mark annually is paid by the members of the District towards such a fund.

District No. 9 has acted favorably upon this proposition.

District No. 10 has been collecting for the past two years two Kronen from each member for the same purpose.

District No. 11 has acted favorably on the proposition.

It is now submitted to this convention.

Institution of District Grand Lodge No. 11.

Since last we met a new District Grand Lodge has been created. It was formed in Constantinople on May 8, 1911.

The following lodges were represented and composed the new District:

Serbia Lodge No. 676, at Belgrad.
Carmel Lodge No. 674, at Sofia.
Ottoman Lodge No. 677, at Adrianople.
Constantinople Lodge No. 678, at Constantinople.
Salonica Lodge No. 679, at Saloniki.
Smyrna Lodge No. 680, at Smyrna.
Eliahu Hannabi Lodge No. 681, at Alexandria.
Cairo Lodge No. 687 at Cairo.
Adolf Kraus No. 689, at Zichron Jacob Colony.
Paul Nathan Lodge No. 690, at Haifa.
Beyrouth Lodge No. 691, at Beyrouth.
Jeruschelajim Lodge No. 376, at Jerusalem.
Schaar Zion Lodge No. 402, at Jaffa.
Galel Lodge No. 418 at Safed.
Maimonides Lodge No. 366, at Cairo.
Mizpah Lodge No. 466, at Phillippopoli.
Geoulah Lodge No. 558, at Slivno.
Ezra Lodge No. 633, at Varna.

One of the first acts of the District was to declare that anyone who is a recipient of the "Halukka" or who receives aid from any benevolent society, whatsoever, is not eligible for membership.

The Grand Lodge further resolved that no one be admitted to membership who is unable properly to support himself and to meet all his obligations.

The District has 870 members. The Grand Lodge spent much of its energies successfully in the effort to unite the various factions and to bring about a closer union in Oriental Israel. The Grand Lodge, as well as the individual lodges, have enjoyed the good-will and the protection of the Ottoman government. In fact, the creation of a Grand Lodge was sanctioned by it, owing to the high standing of nearly all of its members. The Grand Lodge has been a great factor in the amelioration of the condition of the Jews in the various parts of the Empire. Recent events have been most detrimental to the development of the Order in the Orient and it is fervently hoped that peace may soon be established so that not only the lodges of the Order and the Jewish people, but all the people may be enabled to rehabilitate themselves.

The lodges of the District maintain a number of benevolent and educational institutions, among which are the Central Jewish Library in Jerusalem, the Hospital at Jaffa the Kindergarten at Safed, the library and reading-room at Safed, the school for poor children at Cairo, and the society for clothing and supporting poor Jewish school-children at Sofia.

National Jewish Hospital for Consumptives, Denver, Colorado.

I requested the secretary of the Hospital to prepare a report on its activities for the past five years. Extracts from that report are as follows:

> "At the time of your last meeting the Hospital consisted of eight buildings. This number has been increased to ten buildings and a farm consisting of 70 acres with model buildings has been acquired. The farm was the gift of Mr. Louis D. Shoenberg in memory of his son Dudley C. Shoenberg. The additional buildings of the hospital are the Shoenberg Memorial Building and the Grabfelder Building. The Shoenberg Building is the gift of Mrs. Jos. E. Shoenberg and her daughter, Mrs. Hermon August, in memory of the husband and father, Jos. E. Shoenberg. This building has been endowed to the extent of $25,000 by Mr. Hermon August. It is used for a trade school, library and recreation center. The Grabfelder Building is a medical and administrative building, than which there is none more complete in the United States. A very complete X-ray apparatus, a thoroughly equipped laboratory where research work will be carried on, as well as the necessary bacteriological work for the patients, dentist's room, nose and throat room, examination rooms, medical library, and other specialty rooms are housed in this building.
> During the last five years there were 1,081 patients admitted to the hospital at a per capita cost of about $1.50 per day. No patient who has entered this hospital has paid for his care in the institution. The hospital is absolutely free. Since the opening of the hospital it has sheltered 3,000 patients. Two thousand of these patients have left the institution cured or with disease arrested.
>
> The property of the hospital is valued at $375,000 without allowing anything for increase on the value of the land on which the hospital is situated.
> It is most difficult to get statistics on ex-patients. Many prefer not to have it known that they have been in the hospital. With the meager statistics we have been able to get, we find that ex-patients are earning more than $50,000 a year. Interesting reports are received from all over the country telling of returned patients who are well and self-supporting after having been on the charity list on account of sickness.
> The first building of this hospital after its completion was not utilized for six years on account of the hard times in Denver. It did not open until the B'nai B'rith Order undertook to make of this building a hospital. While the Order does not entirely maintain the hospital, it is its patron society and it is largely through the influence and help of the Order that the National Jewish Hospital for Consumptives is today one of the greatest institutions for the treatment and cure of tuberculosis in the world."

In compliance with action taken at the last convention of the Order the Executive Committee paid to the hospital the sum of $47,318.20 during the past five years.

Institution of Leo N. Levi Memorial Hospital.

At the convention of the Order held in 1905, it was resolved that the Constitution Grand Lodge endorse and support the movement to establish a sanitarium at Hot Springs, Ark.

At the last convention of the Order the recommendation of the committee on Charitable Institutions was unanimously adopted, directing "that upon the presentation to and approval by the Executive Committee of the Order of a satisfactory plan or organization of the Hot Springs Sanitarium at Hot Springs, Ark., the Executive Committee is hereby directed to appropriate towards its support an annual sum not exceeding ten cents for each member of Districts 1 to 7 inclusive, said sum to be paid annually during the ensuing five years so long as the Executive Committee of the Order may deem its assistance a desirable and necessary help."

District Grand Lodge No. 7 thereafter appointed special committees with a view of raising funds for the erection of a Sanitarium at Hot Springs, Ark., to be known as the Leo N. Levi Memorial Hospital.

A committee representing all the American Districts, with Brother Emil Nathan as Chairman, was appointed to raise funds wherewith to build the hospital. The committee succeeded in securing over $90,000, sufficient for the purpose.

Last year the institution was dedicated. Its doors are now open to receive patients.

The Executive Committee contributed $7,000.00 for the use of the Hot Springs Sanitarium. The attention of the convention is called to a more detailed report which will be presented as to the erection of the institution and its operation.

Immigration.

One of the big problems that will present itself to the Jews of this country is the problem of immigration, and particularly that portion of the work in connection with immigration that deals with the proper distribution of the immigrants.

Opinion is divided as to whether or not there will be a very large influx of foreigners when the war ceases. The changed condition of industrial affairs in Europe, the possible granting of political rights to Jews and the great demand for labor may tend to retard rather than increase emigration from Europe.

On the other hand, there are those whose opinion is worth considering, who believe that the influx of foreigners, and especially of Jews, will be greater than ever. Should this be the case, the immigration problem will become not only of industrial but of political importance to the Jews of this country.

Ways and means will have to be found for their distribution throughout the length and breadth of his country and the work of the Industrial Removal Office will become more important than ever before.

There is no question that work on a larger scale will be necessary and that our lodges should see the importance of this effort and assist to the best of their ability in taking care of the newcomers removed from the congested seaboard cities.

It is to be regretted that the munificent effort of Brother Jacob H. Schiff to divert immigration to Galveston did not prove as successful as it deserved.

In January, 1911, the Union of Orthodox Jewish Congregations of New York suggested that a call to Jewish national and fraternal organizations be issued to send delegates to a meeting for the purpose of taking united action to combat restrictive immigration measures then pending in Congress. We were of opinion that it was not then necessary to call such a meeting.

Your Executive Committee has carefully watched the agitation for restriction of immigration and has, through its members and jointly with other organizations, opposed the enactment of improper restrictions. One such immigration bill passed Congress, but it was vetoed by President Taft. A similar measure was subsequently re-introduced in Congress and passed by a large majority in both houses. It was vetoed by President Wilson, whose veto was sustained by a narrow margin.

It is evident that the sentiment of the American people is being influenced through agitation by the labor leaders toward the desirability of a reduced immigration. We are in favor of keeping all undesirable immigrants out of this country, be they Jews or Gentiles, but we are advocates of the open door for all desirable immigrants even though they cannot pass a satisfactory examination in reading, writing or arithmetic.

Various Items of Interest.

Arrangements were being made to establish lodges in Amsterdam, Paris and Rome, but our efforts were interrupted by the breaking out of the war. It is hoped that this work will be completed after peace has been restored.

We are indebted to Brother Victor Abraham for a synopsis of all cases decided by the Court of Appeals of the Order since Ullman's Digest was published. This work of love on his part is very much appreciated. It has been published in pamphlet form and distributed to the lodges of the Order.

On the occasion of President and Mrs. Taft's silver wedding Brother Simon Wolf, on behalf of the Executive Committee, presented them with silver Tablets of the Law. President Taft's cordial letter of acknowledgement and a photograph of the gift will be found in the appendix to this report.

The Executive Committee has, on various occasions, been appealed to by co-religionists, members of the Order, and American citizens resident in Palestine, requesting that steps be taken by the Order to protect their rights as American citizens.

This matter was given due attention, as a result of which suggestions and directions in the premises were forwarded to the petitioners in Palestine.

After the collection and distribution of funds to relieve the sufferers of the Kishineff massacre, a certain amount remained in the hands of Mr. Jacob H. Schiff, treasurer. The last Convention of the Order resolved that Brother Schiff be requested to turn over to the Executive Committee our proportionate share of the unexpanded balance in his hands and that the Executive Committee apply such funds to relieve the suffering Jews of Galicia.

In accordance with the foregoing instructions the sum of $6,806.79 was returned to us by Brother Schiff and we forwarded that amount to District Grand Lodge No. 10, with instructions to carry out the resolution of the Convention.

During the past five years the Order, through its Executive Committee and lodges, expended for the relief of widows and orphans and for charitable, benevolent and educational purposes, the sum of $2,265,379.71.

Obituary.

During the five years ending December 31, 1914, 2,832 of our members departed this life. This number does not include the many who have fallen in that terrible struggle for supremacy among the nations now at war. Among those who have been called home and have thus been spared the agony of witnessing brothers, imbued with patriotic zeal, killing brothers on land and sea, were:

Brother Siegmund Bergel, born on the 10th of October, 1843, departed this life on the 3rd of November, 1912. He was a man of commanding figure, master of several languages, a loyal Ben B'rith, and a pious Jew, a widower wedded to our Order. In spite of his advanced years he traveled for months in the Orient establishing lodges, and although a man of only moderate means he accepted no compensation for his services and would permit reimbursement of only a portion of his traveling expenses. I met him for the last time in the early part of 1912 in the city of Berlin. He asked me for a mandate to permit him to establish lodges in Paris, in Brussels, and in Amsterdam, and insisted upon undertaking the work, although his health was already so shattered that his physician forbade him to travel. Brother Bergel relied upon his strong will power and insisted upon undertaking the work, and only reluctantly desisted when, in order to induce him to rest, I told him it was my wish to accompany him and that therefore it would have to be postponed until my next visit to Europe. He fought bravely for life and for usefulness, "but God, who is able to prevail, wrestled with him as the angel did with Jacob and marked him for his own." Brother Bergel was the most enthusiastic member of the Order it has been my fortune to meet. He is gone, but is not dead, for "To live in the hearts we leave behind us is not to die."

We also this day remember the following:

* * * * *

In calling attention to the names of some of our departed brothers, the names of many others will no doubt occur to you, and while deploring their loss it should be some consolation to us that of each and every one of them it can be truthfully said:

> "When the sun goes below the horizon he is not set; the Heavens glow for a full hour after his departure. And when a great and good man sets, the sky of this world is luminous long after he is out of sight. Such a man cannot die out of this world. And when he goes he leaves behind him much of himself. Being dead he speaks."

Recommendations.

As an international organization international duties rest upon us. In times of distress money is needed. If we are to furnish relief we should be able to furnish it promptly, without the necessity, delay and uncertainty of raising funds by issuing an appeal after the need for them has arisen. To such appeals for funds as we have issued in the past only a minority of our members has responded, and nearly always that minority is represented by the same members. If we desire to maintain a position in the front rank we must deserve it. I recommend that an emergency fund be created to which each District, and the lodges under the jurisdiction of the Executive Committee shall pay annually such sum as this convention may decree for each of their members. Districts and lodges in countries now at war should not be taxed until a year has elapsed after peace terms have been settled.

Under our present law there is no minimum age limit to membership. If any lodge should feel so inclined there is nothing to prevent it from forming a kindergarten lodge. I recommend that a law be enacted fixing the minimum age qualification for membership at the age of majority.

I appeal to our members to support generously the National Jewish Hospital for Consumptives and the Leo N. Levi Memorial Hospital, but I do not deem it wise policy to levy a fixed tax upon each member for the support of either of these institutions. Under the present law we are obligated to pay to the Denver Hospital annually forty cents for each member in the American Districts regardless of the hospital's needs. I recommend a change in the law so as to authorize the Executive' Committee to expend in aid of both these two institutions such sums annually as it may deem proper, not to exceed in all fifty cents for each member of the American Districts.

I submit for your consideration the proposition to declare the Menorah the official emblem of the Order.

Our largest District, No. 8, requests that a law be enacted to authorize each District Grand Lodge to elect two or more vice-presidents. I recommend that this be done.

A resolution passed at the last convention provides that a gold medal be awarded not more than once each year to the person who has rendered the most valuable service to the Jewish cause during the year. The resolution should be changed so as to leave it to the discretion of the Executive Committee as to whether or not there was any such service in any particular year as would warrant the awarding of the gold medal.

It is with great regret that I feel obliged to call attention to the fact that the prejudice against our people is so on the increase in America that the opportunity of worthy men and women who seek employment in order to earn an honest livelihood is seriously threatened. On investigation in the city of Chicago it was found that many of the employment agencies have orders from employers not to recommend Jews. Similar conditions doubtless exist in other cities. The Anti-Defamation League is investigating existing conditions and causes in order if possible to find a remely for some of the evils.

Our efforts in the past have been largely directed towards taking care of the helpless. Our efforts should be directed towards preventing others from becoming helpless. We should point out to our members wherein they can be of service. There is not a town so small but our members will be able to find some distress to relieve, some wrong to right, if they look for it. In the larger communities free employment bureaus should be established, in the smaller ones each member should consider himself an employment agent. Immigrants should be helped to become self-sustaining and useful citizens of the land. All of our lodges should undertake Social Service Work, not by resolutions but by acts., We should aid all reform organizations whose aim is to punish law breakers. We should take care that our own conduct should at all times be such as to give no just cause for reproach. Let this convention speak in no uncertain tones on such and similar subjects.

It has been urged that we employ an eloquent and capable field secretary, whose duty it should be to see to it that our membership increases. I am unable to see the wisdom of this proposal. It is not eloquent words but deeds that will bring to us such additional strength as we may need to combat those whose hearts are filled with hatred towards our people. Let our members earnestly and enthusiastically undertake the work outlined above, and this, with the larger service we perform for Jewry throughout the world, will then make propaganda for us with much better effect than any number of field secretaries could possibly do.

I recommend to the Convention to elect as members of the Executive Committee only those who are so situated that they can without doing injustice to themselves, attend not only the meetings of the Executive Committee, but also some of the meetings of the General Committee of their Districts, so that each General Committee may be fully advised of the policy of the Executive Committee in the management of the affairs of the Order. Nor should any member accept the position on the Executive Committee if his business or profession is such as to require all of his time, for some of his time and the best of his thought should occasionally be devoted to the interest of our organization.

I recommend to the incoming administration not to attempt to cover the entire field of usefulness, but rather confine its efforts to a sanely limited sphere of activity and thereby avoid entangling alliances.

Conclusion.

I have been honored twice with the highest office in the gift of the Order. Having given a brief resume of our activities for the past five years I am ready to surrender the leadership to my successor. Some of our members expect the President of the Order to be a sort of a circuit parson, traveling from one end of the country to the other, exhorting believers and non-believers alike. I have been honored with invitations to visit nearly every part of the country, and while it would have given me pleasure to accept such invitations I had neither the time nor the inclination nor the ability to fulfill that part of my duties, if such may be said to be within the duties of President. When first elected President I accepted the office reluctantly and with misgivings. After ten years of service I can truthfully say that I am thankful to my brethren for having placed me at the head of our organization, for it has brought me into contact with our leading co-religionists in nearly all of the countries of the world. I have thus obtained information of Jewish affairs which I could not have obtained in any other way. It has broadened my vision of men and measures, and in this way alone it has been more than ample compensation to me for whatever time and labor I have given to the discharge of my duties.

I have been criticised by some for giving too much attention to foreign affairs. To such charge my defense is that foreign affairs required the most attention. Happy indeed should we be if our co-religionists in other parts of the world needed our services as little as do those who dwell in this land of the free. My conception of the object and purposes of our great international organization is that where our people most suffer, there lies our first duty. From our standpoint the suffering of our co-religionists anywhere in the world is not a foreign affair. The cause of Israel knows no such distinction. The breath of life to our Order is service—service to others. If the time ever comes that the necessity of service to others shall have passed, well may that time also witness, not with sorrow, but with joy and love, the passing into history of an organization whose energies and labors were devoted to that end.

But the fulfilling of Isaiah's prophecy is not yet at hand, when

"The wolf shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard lie down with the kid."

Before that blissful time is reached there is much to do. The hammer of Destiny striking the anvil of Time is slowly fashioning the form and tempering the quality of human justice as God willed it to be. The Children of Israel have suffered long from the world's injustice. Perhaps, behind it all the purpose lay to teach the world justice. But the dawn is breaking. The struggle has not been in vain. Hope sees in the far distance a glimmer of light. Gather together all you strong men of Israel! Hold fast to the heights you have attained! Onwarl! under the banner of service and justice and the victory is ours. Not victory midst the roar of artillery and the crash of battle. Not victory upon a field strewn with the fallen shapes, and red with the blood of our fellow men; but victory through lifting up the lowly, victory through raising the fallen, victory through administering to the wounded and afflicted, victory through centuries of patient suffering for justice's sake, victory through the overcoming of hatred—the victory of an ideal!

ADOLF KRAUS,
President.

Greetings to the Beney Berith Convention

RABBI EMIL G. HIRSCH IN THE REFORM ADVOCATE

Much pride may the readers take in devoting thought this week to the gathering of the Delegates of the Constitutional Convention of the I. O. B. B., scheduled to hold the opening session on May the second in the glorious city by the Golden Gate, the metropolis of the Western Pacific. The history of the Order fills one of the brightest pages in the story of American Jewry, and, to a very noticeable extent, also in that of All-Jewry.

In the forming of the character of the Jew in America the Beney Berith has had a determining part. Old world emigrants, burdened with all sorts of provincial suspicions and peculiarities, the Order's Lodges succeeded in fashioning into genuine Americans, who were brought to know that a larger duty was before the son of Israel in this, his new home, the land of the larger opportunity for him as for many others, than that which would exhaust itself in the preserving of local ghetto traditions.

For a long time the Order was the only ground where the natives of the various European countries and the few of American birth, descended from the Jewish "pilgrim" fathers, could and would meet in the full consciousness that theirs was a common task and basic brotherly affinity. The synagog was torn asunder by agitations concerning ritual and ceremony, doctrine and destiny. There was danger, that in the controversies the sense of the underlying unity might be weakened if not lost altogether. The Beney Berith organizations forestalled such deplorable result. Whatever the difference between the conservative and the orthodox, in the work undertaken by the Order, all alike came to feel that the bond which bound Jew to Jew was strong enough to overcome the drift to separation encouraged by party fanaticism. In the philanthropies as well, the Order must be credited with the initiative in many a direction. It is true, without the hearty co-operation of the non-affiliated, many an institution founded under the auspices of the Order could not have developed. Yet to have given the impulse is more meritorious than to have later collected sufficient funds for the maintenance of the enterprise of bencvolence.

At the present hour the Order is one of the very limited number of truly international movements of Jewish consecration. Though predominantly an American creation it has branched out into the continents beyond the seas. In the Jewish communities of the Central parts of Europe the fraternity has risen to dignity and influence wider and deeper than the numerical census of the membership would at first blush indicate. There to be one of the brotherly band is regarded as a distinction, a diploma certifying to the holder's high qualifications of mind and soul. They who, like the writer, had the good fortune of taking part in the meetings of the Beney Berith Lodges in Germany and Austria will always cherish as a most valuable impression the recollection of the intellectual vigor of the participants and the noble aspirations, both cultural and ethical, which informed every word and argument brought before the assembled brothers. In the Orient, too, even in Jerusalem, the Order has now affiliated Lodges. The seventy languages, which according to Talmudic calculation carried the divine message proclaimed on Sinai, re-echo now the appeal of the Order's convictions and stimulate the re-awakening of many a Jew for a better apprehension of the distinction which is his as the scion of the house of Jacob. That the deliberations of the San Francisco assembly may redound to the good and the glory of all-Israel is the fond expectations of many, and none fears that this expectation will be disappointed. Undoubtedly the Order will be pestered with propositions to enlarge the ropes of its tents—i. e., to merge in official affiliations with other bodies within Jewry.

The Shibboleth, "Union, Larger Union," has gone forth. As though Union were more than a mere empty jar into which content has first to be poured before it has a distinct value. Union like Freedom, and a score of similar words, very much abused by Demagog and Orator, is a mathematical symbol at its best. It depends upon the equation in which it appears for its relative value. The Order has its distinct sphere of activity. It is not intended to be a congregation or a political Jewish nationalistic organization. Let the congregations form their own Unions as indeed they have. Let the Zionists their fifty-seven varieties to contrary notwithstanding form their own agencies for united action. Let the orthodox sponsor their United Synagogs and their Kehilloth. The Order has naught to gain from formal union with all or any of these.

Nor would all-Jewry be profited by such an amalgamation. Whatever distress and calamity be urged in support of the call for larger Union among all the Jews of the wide world the existence of such distress does not overcome the truth that union is a very poor apology for unity and that great diversity is after all stronger evidence of life than uniformity. The dominancy over all things and endeavors arrogated by the brutality of superior numbers, is inequitable where not ideas but interests are in control. That would event in case the scheme of the Protagonists of the "larger Union" were to be adopted. Much better that we proceed along the lines hitherto followed. Divergent they seem to be but all tend in the direction of making Jewry realize more intensely the obligations which it is for all Jews to discharge. When the need for united action arises the various organizations will know how to and will be ready to meet the situation. They have shown this readiness in the past. Why, then, plead for the abandoning of a system of loosely inter-connected independent organizations in favor of a rigid inflexible monster super-union which is bound to be the unwieldy tool of triumphant majorities?

For one the writer has no scruples to avow that he doubts the divine right of Majority no less insistently than he does the divine right of Monarchs. Mobs are not necessarily the guardians of wisdom and the owners of insight. Minorities are more likely to be right. The flexible potential unity of Israel disorganized as it is if you will at all events circumvents the despotism of accidental majorities. It is to be hoped the convention of the Order will not be swept off its secure foundations by never so eloquent a presentation of wonder working potencies of the Over-Union.

Rekhabh utzla'h al debhar Emeth. In this greeting of the Psalmist let the R. A.'s salutation be expressed. That it was not given to the writer to offer his good-wishes orally to the Convention though asked by the German District Grand Lodge to be its delegate, is a source of personal regret. During the week of the sessions his thoughts will be with the assembled brothers. May the counseling together bring forth the good fruit.

THE KEHILLAH, XVI

By PROF. GOTTHARD DEUTSCH, Ph. D.

Our topic has led us into past history and we may just as well continue along that line. It has been said before that private sources are exceedingly rare in older Jewish history. This is a great loss, as we could see in the quotations from the letter of Lipmann Heller given in the last article. In official literary sources, whether written with historic design or for any other purpose, but with the consciousness that they are to be published, the author assumes a certain pose. Even documents are written with a desire to suppress the real facts. When an official hands in his resignation, pleading the usual reasons of health, contemporaries occasionally know what the real reasons are or they guess at them. Our congregational records, including resolutions published in the Jewish press, hardly ever say what people actually think.

This principle applies to rabbinical works even more than to other printed sources. Rabbinic Hebrew, full of quotations and allusions, is in itself a poor instrument for expressing people's real thoughts. As conditions are, we must be glad, however, that we posses these sources, especially the rabbinic responsa, which, treating of actual cases, give us an insight into the life of the people in the days of their author.

The term "responsa" has to be explained. It has not yet become part of the English language, though the Jewish encyclopedia used it, following the German precedent. The word, taken from mediaeval Latin law literature, means an application of the law to a case under consideration. This literature we can follow back to Biblical times. The Pentateuch reports in three places (Lev. 24, 12; Num. 15, 34; 27, 5), cases that were submitted to Moses for decision, because the law was not clear on this point. One is the case of a man who gathered wood on Sabbath, another is the case of a blasphemer, and a third one deals with the estate of a man who left no male heir. Prophetic books speak of submitting such cases to the priests as a regular practice. Zechariah (Chap. 7), reports that a committee was sent from Bethel to inquire of the priest whether it was necessary to still keep the fasts commemorating the destruction of the Temple, after the second Temple had been built. Haggai (2:11) quotes an academic question, asked of the priests for the sake of illustrating a moral lesson. The same expression, "To seek the law," is used by Malachi (2:7), in defining the priests' function. "The priest's lips should keep knowledge, and they should seek the law at his mouth."

In rabbinical literature these instances increase. The more the law was regulated in all details, the more such cases occurred in which the opinion of an expert had to be inquired. It is certainly typical for this condition that the first chapter of the Mishnah, the oldest code of rabbinic law, contains such a case. The sons of Rabbin Gamaliel, the spiritual head of Israel, came home from a banquet after midnight, and wanted to know whether it was still time for them to say the night prayer. Similar instances are found scattered through the Talmud. They possess, aside from their historic interest, as the beginnings of a large literature, a human interest in themselves. A man comes to Rabbi Eleazar Ben Zadok with the following question: "I own large estates and have a number of tenants who work on them. During the Sabbatical year I naturally do not allow them to do regular farm work, but employ them in clearing the ground. While employed there they eat the olives of my orchard. I have scruples on that score, because inasmuch as they are employed on my estate and I have to feed them, it would appear as if I were harvesting my fields." The rabbi [illegible] at this conscientiousness, and [illegible] found a similar religious sincerity. He does, however, prohibit this practice, and orders that the owner of the estate pay the hands in [illegible] the olive grove to [illegible] 44 b).

A very large part of the literature is [illegible] with cases of matrimonial law, and [illegible] that we obtain most [illegible] material. The Talmud [illegible] the following interesting case. [illegible] deathbed wanted to [illegible]. The reason why he did [illegible] quite clear. If his wife remained a widow, she would be subject to the law of levirate, which would require that she could not marry again unless released by the surviving brother of her husband, a law which even today entails a great hardship on widows in orthodox circles. The dying man had made all provisions for the writing of the bill of divorcement, but it being late on Friday afternoon, the Sabbath began before the man had time to hand the "get" to his proxy, and on Sabbath he died. The question is decided in the affirmative, the divorce being considered valid. It is a general practice in rabbinical law to make allowances for the sake of women (Gittin 77, b).

A great many cases fall within the large field of dietary law. Modern rabbinic legal literature has very seldom to deal with cases of civil law, but a great deal more with the dietary provisions. Such cases are, however, already found in Talmudic literature, and show in the attitude of the rabbis to each other the same habits, that we find in our own time. One of the frequent cases is that of a nail or a needle, found in the reticulum of cattle. Such a case was brought before a rabbi in Babylonia. He evidently was in doubt how to decide it, when somebody told him of the presence in the city of a preacher, who had been in Palestine, and had watched the practice of the head of the highest court, Judah Hanasi (Hullin 51, a). Occasionally such questions lead to heated controversy, like those, that not so long ago came before a Chicago court, in the question whether the Matzos, manufactured by a Cincinnati firm are kosher. Not many years ago a similar controversy occurred in Chicago, and last year in New York, on kosher meat. The literature of the seventeenth century is full of such cases, and very often one rabbi complains bitterly of the unprofessional conduct of another, who meddled with a case in his jurisdiction.

Naturally the ritual of the synagogue is also an object of serious consideration. The Mishnah had laid down the rule that in reading from the Torah, first a priest, then a Levite and then Israelites had to be called, but the question of etiquette after these two men had received their share of honor was undecided. This question seems to have given considerable trouble to a congregation in Galilee, and was submitted to a rabbi of the fourth century. He declares that the rank next to the priest belongs to scholars who hold an office in the congregation, they are to be followed by scholars who are qualified for such office, and these again by the sons of scholars who held office, to be followed by the trustees of the synagogue, and then by other people indiscriminately (Gittin 59, b-60, a).

As a matter of peculiar interest one more case may be reported. The people of Magdala, a place known to the Jews of the present generation best through Maeterlinck's "Mary Magdalene," were evidently quite rigorous in their religious views. They would not use acacia wood for domestic purposes because the Bible reports that the Ark of the Covenant had been made from it. Someone evidently declared that this practice had no basis in law, and the matter was submitted to a rabbi for decision, who ruled that people should not deviate from the custom of their ancestors (Gen. Rabba, 94, 4). This is a policy which we find again down to our own times. Even where a law does not speak clearly on a subject, an established practice has the force of a law. Readers will remember that I quoted once a Purim amusement, at which a mock rabbi, asked to give a decision on a case, says: "If it was done so last year, let it be done so again."

This leads us directly to our own topic. The people of Nikolsburg, who might have given us very interesting experiences if they had preserved the memories of the War of Thirty Years, a great deal of which passed not far from their city, or the stories told by numerous refugees that fled from the Cossack massacres that took place from 1648 to 1655, or of Turkish Jews, who, fleeing from the war that followed the raising of the seige of Vienna in 1683, found their way to this prominent Jewish settlement, and must have created quite a sensation by their costume and their strange habits. They did not do it. Only in occasional references, involving questions of rabbinical law, we find such information. Few rabbis of Nikolsburg have left their traces in literature, and only two of them gave us interesting recollections of rabbinical decisions throwing light on the critical events in the seventeenth century as they affected the Jews. They are Mendel Krochmal, who died at Nikolsburg in 1661, and his son-in-law, Gerson Ashkenazi, who died in 1693, as rabbi of Metz. Both were from Cracow. Rabbis of prominent congregations in those days were almost exclusively imported from Poland. The reasons were two-fold. Poland has a surplus of Jews and especially a great surplus of students of the Talmud. Perhaps another reason was that in those days, when the rabbi acted as judge, it was required that he should not be related to any member of his congregation. We find complaints along these lines very often in rabbinical literature, and perhaps this was the reason that it was considered advisable to take a man, who, coming from a different country, was sure not to have any family relations in the congregation. Of the two men Gerson Ashkenazi had the most interesting career. A native of Cracow, where in his early days he was a member of the rabbinate, he was successively rabbi of Prossnitz in Moravia, of Nikolsburg, where he succeeded his father-in-law; of Vienna, which city he had to leave when the Jews were expelled in 1670, and finally rabbi of Metz, where he spent the last years of his life. Having had such an interesting career, and having seen so many places, he would have been able to give us some interesting information on the history of his time. He did not give it, because he was a typical rabbi of the seventeenth century, mostly interested in the legal aspect of a case, and not naming persons or places, but merely referring to a place as a certain place, and to people as A and B. Still his cases, even as they are, help us to gain some insight into the life of the Jews at this critical period. It is strange to see how short the memory of the ghetto is. When I arrived in Nikolsburg there were quite a number of families who could trace back their descent to these two men. But all they knew was that they were descended from Mendel Krochmal, or as people said, from the Zemach Zedek. It is a peculiar habit of the Jews that the man disappeared behind the book. He is referred to, not by his name, but by the title of his chief work. In this way we might find even in our days quite a number of old-fashioned Jews who regularly every week read Raschi's commentary to the portion of the Pentateuch, but if they were asked what Raschi's real name was, when and where he lived, they would in all likelihood be embarrassed.

Another difficulty in tracing a family is the absence of family names, although in the case of these two men we have already family names in Mendel Krochmal and Gerson Ashkenazi, the latter being the general name for people who came, or were at one time descended from Germany, and besides he is occasionally called Ulf and Fass. A grandson of his was rabbi in the eighteenth century in Nikolsburg under the name of Gerson Politz, pointing to a small town in Moravia called Pulitz, and the descendants of the latter were still known in my time as Politzer. This is even now a frequent name amongst Moravian and Hungarian Jews. I cannot forego giving here a personal recollection of a member of this family called Selig Gerson, or as it was pronounced there, Selig Gashe. He was a queer character, which is already seen from the fact that he was an old bachelor, a rather unusual thing in the ghetto. One of his peculiarities was that he could not stand the word "Luft." All that was necessary in the ghetto, where everybody knew everybody else's foibles, was to know this fact, and poor Selig Gashe had a very bad time. Whenever he appeared in the "Gass" he was sure that some boy from a corner or from a garret window would call "Luft." As soon as he indignantly looked for the offender, every trace of him was lost. Even occasionally when he was seen from a distance, some miscreant wrote the word "Luft" on doors and window shutters, enjoying the wrath with which Selig Gashe wiped every trace of this insulting word off the doors and windows. He was sitting in a cafe house when someone apparently in all innocence remarked: "There is a 'Luftzug' (draft) here." One time he actually struck an innocent person. A young woman who had recently married and came from a different city, naturally didn't know anything of Selig Gashe's foible, who called at her husband's store on business. In those days, it must be remarked, there were no wedding trips or anything of this kind. A woman married, and after spending a few days with her parents, followed her husband to the place of his destination, and on the next day was seen in his store working for him. Selig Gashe came there, and again, according to the simple customs of the ghetto, he did not introduce himself, asked for the man, and when he heard that the latter wasn't present, he spoke a few words to the bride, asking her, as was natural under these conditions, how she liked her new state. She replied that she was quite well satisfied; the only trouble was that there was a "Luftzug" in the store. The very moment she had said these words, Selig Gashe ran out, slammed the door, and the poor woman was frightened to death. When her husband returned, she told him the story that somebody had called for him who was suddenly seized with a fit of insanity. Not knowing in what her offense consisted, it took a long while before the husband found out that the fit of instanity was caused by the innocent complaint of a drfat in his store. And then, of course, he knew at once who the caller was.

Speaking of the two men as having lived in critical times, it will perhaps be necessary to add that in the seventeenth century Moravia suffered a great deal from the Swedish troops, who for months laid siege to Bruenn, and according to the customs of that time, sent marauders all over the country. In addition there was the trouble caused by the Cossack revolution in Poland, which like our pogrom eras of 1882 and 1905, sent an immense number of fugitives in all directions. Both cases are reflected in the literature of rabbinic law, because in many instances women were deserted or were unable to find any trace of their husbands who had been killed by marauders, or by Cossacks as the case happened to be, and these questions naturally entered a great deal into matrimonial law.

If history repeats itself, Jewish history is the most typical specimen. Political upheavals always affected the Jews. As we see it now in Poland, where the Jews are affected most severely by the war, the death struggle of the decaying kingdom of Poland in the seventeenth century brought endless suffering to the Jews. Jesuitism had resulted in causing the Cossacks, who are Greek Catholics, to rebel against their Polish masters, who, controlled by the Jesuits, tried to convert them to Roman Catholicism. The victims of this rebellion were the Jews, and all who could fled from the theater of these massacres. A great many found their way to Moravia, and being separated from their families, the most complex questions of matrimonial law arose. A woman who had landed in Nikolsburg as a child, and had married there, gave birth to a first-born son. According to the law this son had to be redeemed by a priest, but in case the mother was a daughter of a Cohen or a Levite, this procedure was unnecessary. The woman who had only a dim recollection of her parents, did not know whether her father was a Cohen or a Levite, and Rabbi Krochmal, to whom the question is submitted, decides that the case presents primarily a claim of a Cohen, who according to the law, has the right to either demand the child or five pieces of silver. It is, therefore, up to him to prove his claim. A more serious case was that of a young man, who, during the massacres in what is now Southern Russia, had been separated from his wife. He had heard rumors that the latter, in order to save her life, had become an apostate. According to rabbinical law, this would give him a right to divorce her, even against her will. Rabbi Krochmal decides that such a rumor is not a testimony, and in a postscript to the decision he notes with satisfaction that events showed that his decision was just. The woman had never apostatized, but had been sold to Constantinople into slavery, was there redeemed by the local Jewish community, and sent to Jassy, from which city she was helped to Lublin, where, through friends, she heard of her husband's whereabouts, communicated with him and joined him in Nikolsburg. More tragical is the case of a woman who had seen her husband murdered in Polonnoie, Volhynia. Rabbi Krochmal permits her remarriage on the ground of her own testimony. A rather remarkable information is gained from her statement that the Cossacks usually spared the women, declaring that they were sufficiently punished if they were deprived of their husbands and had to shift for themselves. One cannot help feeling that, fearing to be disgraced, the women did not always tell the truth about their experiences.

In 1648, when the Cossack massacres began, the War of Thirty Years had just ended. This war had created untold misery in Moravia, which had been invaded by the Swedish soldiery. The Jews who had to make a living by peddling, constantly risked their lives. Numerous stories of this kind are found in the rabbinical decisions. A few Jews from Nikolsburg, visiting a fair, met some soldiers, with whom they entered into a business deal. The latter, learning that the men were from Nikolsburg, said: "Yes, we know the place. Three years ago, when we were still fighting under the Swedish colors—we are now in the emperor's service—our captain saw a Jew from Nickolsburg, and said to me, 'Hans, get me this Jew, we must have some money.' I replied, 'If you want to smelt some money out of him, you may shoot him, but I am not going to do it.' Then the captain marched him to the woods and there killed him." In this way the Jews learned of the whereabouts of one of their neighbors who had been missing for three years. Somewhat different is another story. Three Jews from Nickolsburg, returning from Vienna where they had gone on business, passed a place called Schrick, about thirty miles from their home. There some peasants, who knew them, scared them with the report that the country was overrun by the enemy's cavalry. Thus the Jews were induced to hide in a house where they were killed by those who pretended to save their lives. It was more than a year later that a Jew from Nikolsburg overheard a young peasant, who was gambling in a barn, say: "Amschel, give me the right kind of dice." As the name of one of the three Jews killed was Amschel, the Jew suspected the young man would know something of the fate of the missing men, and he learned the story. In no single case is it the question of bringing the murderers to justice, but merely whether the widows may marry. Another pathetic case is that of a young man who right after his marriage, joined the army as a suttler. His wife insisted that he give up his dangerous business and return to her, or divorce her. Being much attached to his wife, he said that he expected to make enough money in two years to be able to do business at home. He finally agreed to give a conditional divorce. The rabbi would not consent to this procedure, though it is permissible according to rabbinical law, but declared that he should divorce her unconditionally and enter into a written agreement that neither party should marry within two years, which would allow them to remarry after that time. The husband did not return, and the rabbi allowed the woman to marry another man.

A somewhat similar question is reported by Gerson Ashkenazi. An apostate to Christianity was sued for divorce. He was willing to grant it under the condition that his father-in-law should give him a certain sum of money, to which he claimed to be entitled under the marriage contract. The rabbi would not allow it because a divorce in order to be valid must be given without reservation. It seems that the case occurred in the state of the Bishop of Treves, and the sovereign, as an ecclesiastic, saw the justice of the statement, confirming the decision of the rabbi, that the claim of the man should be brought before the secular courts after the divorce. Thus the divorce was granted. Subsequently the apostate claimed that he had acted under compulsion, and that the act was invalid. The rabbi sides with him. According to Maimonides, a man may be compelled by secular authorities to divorce his wife, because this is a moral obligation, in case he does not wish to continue matrimonial relations. Rabbi Gerson, however, declares that inasmuch as the man, in this case, had thrown off his religious obligations, the rabbinate had lost its authority over him.

A different case of matrimonial law, which throws light on social conditions, is discussed by Gerson Ashkenazi. A, who is a Cohen, is engaged to B's daughter. C claims to have married her secretly, and brings witnesses, testifying to this fact. On the ground of this testimony A's father insists that the engagement be broken, and inasmuch—a case familiar to us from Zangwill's "Children of the Ghetto"—as his son is a Cohen, he could not marry the girl, even if she should be divorced. B insists that the engagement is valid, declaring that the witnesses were bought, and the latter admit the fact. In addition it is proven that one of them had committed the crime of eating pork, and thus had become disqualified from giving testimony in court. Finally he brings other witnesses, who testify that C had gone around offering money to people who were willing to appear as witnesses for him. A, on the other hand, declares that he had another reason for breaking the engagement. B had become a bankrupt, and caused disgrace to the whole Jewish community. B admits this fact, but declares that his standing in the business world was not part of the agreement, and that he would fulfill the financial obligations entered into by the contract. Two rabbinical courts had rendered opposite decisions, a fact which Gerson Ashkenazi deplores, deciding that the engagement is valid and if any party withdraws from the agreement, it has to pay the forfeit (Kenas), stipulated in the engagement contract.

A somewhat similar case is decided by him when he was still rabbi of Nikolsburg. It contains a romance, which we would not expect in the ghetto, where marriages were contracted by the parents of the couple through a "schadchen." A boy of eighteen wanted to marry a girl who was not quite twelve. As the parents rejected him, he watched his opportunity one Saturday morning, when they were in the synagogue, went with a friend to the house of the girl, put a ring on her finger, saying to her the usual formula—as correctly as any rabbi could, so the witness declares—and went home. The matter was the subject of the gossip of the ghetto, which in those days took the place of the social column in our Jewish press, but the parents did not take notice of it until Tuesday. As the girl was a minor the main question was whether the parents had not originally consented, because they did not protest until three days after the marriage. The testimony of the girl herself was of no consequence. She claimed to have accepted the ring merely as a present and never to have thought of marrying the man. "Ich begehr' ihn nit. Ein Kappore soll er sein." It is supposed that she was coached for this statement. The rabbi, however, decides that the marriage is not valid, chiefly on the ground that the girl is a minor, and that the protest of the parents, though coming three days later, annulled the marriage.

The war brought numerous troubles. One of them was the housing and feeding of soldiers. The "Einquartierung," I remember from 1866 as a duty that was dreaded. It was more so those days, though hardly any worse than what the poor Jews in Galicia and Northern Hungary must have suffered during the last few months. The Jewish community in such a case had compromised with the commander on a sum of money, instead of furnishing board and housing accommodations. The reasons given are interesting. They are afraid that the soldiers, if housed by them, would steal, their presence would interfere with business, because people are afraid of them, and finally, there would be the grave danger that soldiers would mix milk and meat dishes, or bring prohibited food to the houses. On this all agree. The only question was how the members should be assessed for the payment of the stipulated sum. The rich people claimed that inasmuch as every householder would have to house and feed soldiers, the assessments should be according to household regardless of property. The poor claim that, as in every other case, the assessment should be made according to taxable property. Rabbi Krochmal declares that according to Talmudic law, assessment should be made according to householders, but humanity demanded that the more equitable procedure of assessing property should be resorted to.

A similar decision is given in another case of communal politics. In one congregation a family consisting of a father, two married sons and two sons-in-law, pays sixty percent of the communal taxes. On the ground of the bylaws of the congregation the majority of taxpayers carries a vote only on condition that they represent the majority of the taxes paid. In this way the five votes of one family, practically decide an election. Rabbi Krochmal declares that under such conditions the constitution has to be revised. To the same category belongs the following case. A man had assaulted another man, and by the decision of the rabbinical court, was deprived of his civic rights for a year. This involves his inability to make any sworn statement. The question is, may he be admitted to an affidavit, as regards his taxable property. The rabbit declared that this case forms an exception.

The exigencies of business life often required a deviation from rabbinical law. A Jew must not take interest on a loan from another Jew. This law is evaded in the following manner. The man who wishes to borrow money, sells to the creditor an object, under the condition to buy it back within a given time, at a higher price. In one case of this kind, the creditor refuses to give up the object claiming that the transaction was a regular sale. The rabbi decides against him. In a question of ritual law, he is more stringent. The law requires that the first-born male animal cannot be used for service or consumption except under very difficult provisions, which would be too intricate to discuss. A Jew, owning a cow, sells her to a Christian for a small amount, to be bought back after she had given birth to the calf. The rabbi declares this transaction invalid. To the class of ritual law, belongs also the question, giving us an insight into the savagery of the Thirty Years' War, whether one may wear a belt made of human hide. The rabbi, naturally, discusses the question from the point of view of ritual law, but it is gratifying to see that while a tanned hide is not considered part of a carcass, he prohibits the practice. An entirely modern question is discussed by Gerson Ashkenazi, who anticipates some of our modern anti-trust legislation. A and B entered into an agreement, according to which B should not deal in a certain class of goods, nor do business in a certain locality. For this concession B shall receive from A a certain sum of money and other considerations. A, who is a very influential man, does not fulfill his part of the contract, but demands of B that he keep his. B ignores the order, and A sues him for breach of contract, and is defaming him as a perjurer. It is a clear case of restraint of trade. Rabbi Gerson decides that the breach of the contract on the part of A does not absolve B from his obligation, but he has a right to sue A for fulfillment of his obligation, and for damages. It would be very tempting to give a resume of the rabbi's reasons, because the decision rests on the question whether a certain passage in the Talmud is to be read according to Alfasi's or according to Rabbi Ascher's version. It would be, however, too difficult to give to a lay public a clear view of this legal exegesis.

Two specimens of moral obligations and dogmatic definitions may conclude this presentation. The first one is quite modern. The price of fish had risen in Nikolsburg to such an exorbitant height that the congregation passed a law that no fish should be bought within three months. So they had already nearly three hundred years ago, the problem of high cost of living to deal with. They had, however, the advantage over our days that they needed no experts in economics, but discuss the question from the point of view of Talmudic literature. The Talmud says that every man's income is decided by God on Rosh Hashanah, with the exception of what he spends for Sabbath and holidays. Inasmuch as such expenditure is incurred for the glory of God, man must not live within his means, for God will take care of him. Therefore, someone asks the rabbi what right has the congregation to pass such an ordinance, which implies a doubt in divine providence. The answer is clever. "It is true," the rabbi says, "that God would increase the income of man in accordance with the price of fish for Sabbath, but the trouble is that poor people have often not the necessary money to pay for their Sabbath meal. They have to borrow, and since their credit is limited, they would be unable to honor the Sabbath properly, and therefore, the legislation is just, because it takes into consideration the needs of the poor."

A deeply pathetic story is found in another discussion of ethical character. A Jewish peddler came home one Friday in February from his tour in the neighboring province of Lower Austria. He had a boy with him who helped him carry his goods. When they were about six miles from Nikolsburg, a blizzard arose. A blacksmith, in whose shop they stopped, warned them against continuing their journey. The man, however, said: "I wish to be at home on Sabbath," but turning to the boy, he said: "You must stay here." The boy refused, and answered jestingly, "I want to get my share of the 'Kugel,' too." They walked on, and the weather became fiercer and fiercer, until the boy could not walk any more. The man, who had tried to assist him, felt that his strength was giving way, and being near the town, he told the boy to sit down in a certain place, while he hurried to the city. When he reached the first house he fainted, and it took some time until he was brought to. His first word was an appeal to look for the boy. Searching parties were sent out, but, blinded by the snow and sleet, they failed to find the boy, who froze to death. The man had scruples, feeling that he ought to have insisted that the boy remain in the village. Rabbi Krochmal, discussing the case, proves from the Talmud, that breakfast is a protection against cold weather, and inasmuch as the boy had had his breakfast, his employer had done what he could. Inasmuch, however, as he felt scruples, he should take upon himself a slight penance. He should take three men, go to the boy's grave and ask his forgiveness, then he should fast forty days in succession, taking only one meal in the evening, and furthermore should fast for the remainder of his life on the eve of every new moon, on the three non-obligatory fasts following Passover and Succoth festivals, and finally during the ten days of penitence.

In order not to close this sketch with such a sad story, a remarkable educational achievement shall form the conclusion. In a case of divorce the husband has to say a certain formula. In the particular case decided by Krochmal, the husband is a deafmute, but he is so intelligent that he knows even all the intricate rules about the prayerbook. The rabbi, therefore, allows the sign language in this case. Isaac Pereira, one of the pioneers of deafmute instruction, must have had his predecessors in the seventeenth century.

SENATOR WILLIAM E. BORAH APPEALS FOR CLEMENCY FOR LEO M. FRANK.

Boise, Idaho, May 10, 1915.

My Dear Governor:

I am sure that in so grave a matter you will not feel that I am intruding or imposing upon your time in offering my petition in favor of clemency for Leo M. Frank. I was attracted as a member of the legal profession to this case from the beginning by reason of certain features of the trial which seemed to me to be contrary to the great fundamental principles of Anglo-Saxon jurisprudence. I have followed as closely as I could the proceedings from the first to the last decision of the Supreme Court of the United States and I cannot be rid of the conviction that it would be a mistake upon this record as it now stands to deprive this man of his life.

I shall not, of course, burden you with details, knowing as I do that you will receive the briefs of able counsel and also knowing that you are perhaps far more familiar with the details of the case than I am, but I could not refrain from expressing in a brief way my views in regard to the matter. My earnest and sincere hope is that you will find it compatible with your duties as the chief magistrate of your state and in harmony with your high sense of right and justice to withhold in this instance the death penalty. I have and could have no possible interest in Mr. Frank as an individual, but I have an interest in common with every citizen who loves our institutions in seeing that the tribunals of justice shall not only be free at all times from passion and fear, as a matter of fact, but also that they shall be free from the imputation of acting under such influence.

I do not know the exact relation of your Pardon Board to the Governor, but if it is proper that this letter should be first filed with the Pardon Board I would be glad to have you transmit it to that Board.

With assurances of high esteem, I am
Respectfully,
(Signed) WM. E. BORAH.

HON. J. H. SLAYTON,

A JEWISH BATTALION IN EGYPT.

A number of Jewish laborers in the Jewish colonies of Palestine were expelled from that country when Turkey declared war against Russia and her allies. These laborers found refuge in Egypt and on their arrival there the Russian consul ordered them all to be sent to Russia, but they managed to get permission to join the English forces in Egypt and to form a separate battalion. All officers and men are Jews, wearing a Magen David on their caps and on their left arms. Sir John Hamilton, the commander of the Engilsh forces in Egypt, recently inspected the battalion and spoke very highly of the discipline and morale of the men and expressed the hope that the Jews will receive their full reward when the allies come out victorious.

RIOTS AGAINST JEWS IN ENGLAND.

After the sinking of the Lusitania riots broke out in London and in other English towns. Much damage was caused to Jewish property. Mistaking the Jewish names for German, the mob attacked Jewish business houses and destroyed Jewish property. In the anti-German riots in Johannesburg, South Africa, the Jews also suffered considerable losses by the destruction of property. Among the Germans and Austrians who were recently ordered to be placed in concentration camps are also a great many Jews.

THE SAN FRANCISCO CONVENTION

The recent convention of the Constitution Grand Lodge held in San Francisco, Cal., was an epoch-making one in many respects. It was, as in years past, composed of prominent men from all parts of the country. It was, however, more than ordinarily a hard-working convention. Its sessions were well attended and very earnest.

The Convention did not chase rainbows, it dealt with practical questions in a practical way. One of the pronounced characteristics was that the delegates not only eschewed diplomatic compliments, but were extremely plain spoken. At times this characteristic was keenly felt by some of the delegates, but it did not mar the brotherly and friendly spirit prevailing during the sessions, for due allowance was made for the earnestness of those who engaged in the combat of debate. Earnestness and zeal and the deepest solicitude for the welfare of the Order was displayed by the delegates from all of the Districts.

The President's Message, extracts of which are published in another part of this issue, was received with a praise and enthusiasm commensurate with the importance of the subjects presented therein.

The Convention made history not only for the Order, but for all Jews by entering into fields of usefulness, which beyond any doubt will make the next five years the most active in the history of the Order.

The formation of the Anti-Defamation League was approved and its work ordered continued.

An assessment was levied for the creation of a relief fund so as to enable the Order to render prompt relief in cases of calamity or great distress.

Social Service Work now conducted by way of experiment was nationalized.

An Immigration Commission is to be appointed, whose duty it will be to make special study of immigration questions so as to be in a position to render aid in all matters affecting immigrants.

The work ordered to be undertaken will [illegible] make the offices of the Order the [illegible] headquarters for [illegible] affairs in the country. Each portion of the work will be under the guidance of an experienced specialist and it is expected that the various branches will be so thoroughly organized as to [illegible]

The Convention concluded its work by electing officers for the next five years. The President was re-elected [illegible] and given an ovation such as is seldom [illegible] in [illegible] conventions.

During the past [illegible] of the Order [illegible] to further [illegible] the welfare [illegible] or religious [illegible] The Order rendered [illegible] public opinion on behalf of the persecuted; it paved the way for a more comprehensive and better understanding among the Jews of all lands; it has directed its energies to the safeguarding of the rights of our people wherever and whenever their unrestricted enjoyment was threatened.

In continuing this work in the future special attention will have to be paid to conditions that have arisen in the United States. Political and religious liberty seems to be considered by some as license to sneer at and disregard not only the law of God but also the law of man. The breaking of religious ties and the laxity now observant here and there in what was once justly called the model home life of Jews, has served in certain quarters to increase disrespect for the law and is no doubt the cause for our inability at present to point to the fact, as we were once able to do, that the jails and alms houses are almost free of people of our faith. The Order will make an effort to create healthier conditions. This can only be done by helping to bring malefactors of our own people to speedy justice, by bringing no reproach upon our people by our own conduct and by helping to uplift those of our people who have fallen by the wayside. In this work we need not bespeak the assistance of any other Jewish organization, for we are sure that we will have their hearty co-operation and help as well as that of all good people whether members of our organization or not.

The next convention meets in five years at Cleveland, Ohio. If the work planned for in the meantime is properly carried out, the report of the officers to the next convention will be the history of Jewish activities, unequaled by any Jewish organization of the past.

THE OPPORTUNITY THAT IS OURS AS A NATION.

One more nation has been engulfed in the cataclysm over there in Europe. The plunge was taken, we may assume, with a deliberate step. Statesmen who have the well-being of their country in their keeping think twice and thrice before unleashing the furies of bloody and costly warfare. Still in the final decision much of passion may be intermingled and sometimes prime ministers have been known to yield to the clamor of the irresponsible mob.

We have with us in this country likewise the ugly visage of a blind and impassioned mob. The press is like all human institutions a mixture of good and evil. Publicity is a necessary adjunct to democratic institutions. Public opinion is a useful check upon the doings of those whom we, the people, place in high position. The press may voice public opinion, but it may also make it. We are not always sure that high and lofty and pure motives dictate the policies of newspapers. But the unthinking majority of citizens allow themselves to be guided and misguided by the press.

We as a nation have been placed by the war in a difficult position. When all the laws governing the intercourse of nations become a dead letter, neutrality becomes itself undefined and indefinable. We know that we were sitting upon a powder mine. We apprehended being drawn into the maelstrom of hate and passion against our will. What if in wanton forgetfulness of caution and prudence one or the other belligerent insulted our flag or did damage to limb and body and life of American citizens? The issue came sooner than we expected it.

On the surface the sinking of the Lusitania with its human freight was a crime. Indiscriminate snuffing out of the lifebreath of non-combatants is murder pure and simple. Was England less guilty for the failure to protect the innocent victims under her flag and near her shores? Be that as it may, we as a nation cannot suffer American citizens, men and women and babes, to be drowned like rats on the high seas. And yet it behooves us to keep our head cool. They are demagogues that would at a time like this inflame the passions of the people. We have cause for righteous indignation. But would it be wise to forego the cooler judgment?

Whatever may have been the ultimate causes of the European conflagration, the immediate cause was the loss of self-control. There is in the life of the individual a moment when reason is flung away and the mind is given over to an obsession. With nations it is still worse. With a code of honor muchly overdrawn and with the pernicious doctrine of national sovereignty in matters of right and wrong, the sword is unsheathed; and then there is no revoking the fateful step. Nations as a matter of fact are not sovereign in matters of right and wrong. The tribunal may be lacking to enforce international morality, but when a nation arrogates to itself the right to ignore treaties as scraps of paper and to break the plighted word, the voice of humanity must step in to call all these deeds by their right name. Die Weltgeschichte ist das Weltgericht. And there is a God in heaven who will condemn the guilty.

The carnage in Europe means a recrudescence of paganism. Behind the cruel war with all its shocking savagery there is a cruel, barbaric philosophy. The God whom Judean missionaries preached to the Western world has been dethroned, and the gods of pagan Europe have been restored to a place of honor and power long vacated. The God of right is forgotten, and the demons of might usurp His place. Shall we in this country likewise suffer ourselves to be paganized?

Ours as a nation is the singular opportunity to stand firm as a rock. They may brand us over there as hypocrites. They say that we pray for peace and at the same moment supply the belligerents with munitions. But they are superficial that judge the American character thus. We would gladly forego the gain of a few dollars if we but could bring belligerent Europe to a sense of calm judgment and to the necessity of composing their quarrels in the interests of humanity. We shall not rush headlong into complications from which there is no retreat. We have been made to suffer innocently and for no cause. But we bear ourselves with dignity. We shall call the offenders to their senses. We shall insist on an accounting. But we shall not allow ourselves to be drawn into the conflict heedlessly. Ours is the opportunity to dictate to the nations not by flourishing weapons, but by the timely reminder that if Europe's sense of right and wrong is blunted ours is not. In the name of the God of right we must call upon them to put an end to the needless sacrifice of men and means, to that wasteful destruction of the accumulated heritage of centuries, and above all to the havoc which has been wrought in the most cherished fruits of civilization, in the spiritual blessings that our fathers bequeathed unto us. Let the United States take upon itself the apostolate of peace and mercy. Let the voice of its chief magistrate ring out with insistence upon right against might. Giant-like may our country stand forth to proclaim to the nations that there is One higher and stronger than they, and that to Him they are accountable for their misdeeds. The gods of hatred and revenge are nought; God the Just and Merciful still rules the world, and unto Him nations must submit. Let us fast and let us pray, but let us act and speak, from the fullness of our trust in the triumph of righteousness over the powers of greed and hatred and passion. And the American people will act and speak.

A GREAT LOSS.

The Jewish community of Denver, Col., as well as the Order of B'nai B'rith have recently suffered a great loss. Together they mourn the death of David [illegible] Lehman, philanthropist, business man, humanitarian and true son of the Covenant, who departed from the midst of the living on April 22nd.

As a citizen of Denver for the last 26 years, he gained the recognition and confidence of a wide circle of business men and became one of the most trusted men in Denver. Thousands of men, rich and poor alike, reposed their trust in him. His business ability, combined with his deep religious nature, secured for him the love and esteem of his fellow citizens. He became a director of the National Bank of Commerce of the city of Denver, which office he held for many years. As a faithful follower of the teachings of the B'nai B'rith he learned to devote his energy to the cause of Israel, to charity and benevolence and to alleviating the sufferings of the sick and needy among his people. For the last fifteen years he was treasurer of Temple Emanuel in Denver and for the last four years he was vice-president and chairman of the finance committee of the Denver National Jewish Hospital.

The B'nai B'rith News extends deepest sympathy to the family of the departed brother and sincerely prays for the repose of his good soul.

Peace be unto his ashes.

WILLIAM A. GANS.

Wm. A. Gans, of New York, for many years a prominent figure in B'nai B'rith circles and other Jewish fraternal organizations, died on April 8, 1915. He was a graduate of the New York University. His B'nai B'rith career dates back many decades. He was a charter member of Manhattan Lodge, chairman of the Committee on Intellectual Advancement of the District, and President of the Maimonides Library until it became a branch of the New York Public Library. Brother Gans was honored by the election as chairman of the Constitution Grand Lodge convention held in Cincinnati in 1887.

The Order at large has sustained a great loss in his demise, and the B'nai B'rith News extends to his family its sincere condolence and sympathy.

BANQUET IN HONOR OF MR. NATHAN COHN.

On Monday night, April 19th, the friends of Brother Nathan Cohn, the newly elected President of District Grand Lodge No. 7, gave a grand banquet in his honor at the Maxwell House, Nashville, Tenn. Mr. Aaron Bergeda, secretary of the city board of education, acted as toastmaster. Among the guests were prominent Jews from New Orleans, Memphis and Washington and nearly all the Jewish business, educational and religious leaders of Nashville. Brother Cohn was praised by the speakers as a leader in civic affairs, an advocate of high ideals and a leading representative of the Nashville bar. Toastmaster Bergeda in presenting Brother Cohn said he was introducing a man the whole city loved because of his disinterested devotion to the civic good.

In responding to the toasts, Brother Cohn said, among other things: "I shall strive to build up the Order in every possible respect. No man can accomplish much alone. He must be helped by those whose disinterested service counts for much. We must deal with great problems, those of immigration, and the care of the infirm and feeble. The Order has done wonderful work in this direction and by the assistance of my loyal friends I am determined that it shall exceed its past record."

ALFRED M. COHEN.

Hon. Alfred M. Cohen, of Cincinnati, Past President of District Grand Lodge No. 2, and an ardent worker in B'nai B'rith circles, was elected first president of the executive committee of the Civic Council of Club Presidents of Cincinnati. The Council includes the presidents of all the civic clubs of the city, with the mayor as chair ex-officio. The office to which Mr. Cohen was elected in the Council is next to that of the mayor.

Brother Herman Asher, of New York, President of District Grand Lodge No. 1, brought into the Order Justice Benj. N. Cardoza of the Court of Appeals of the State of New York. In presenting his petition for membership, Brother Asher said: "We want the very best of our people in the Order, for the Order stands for what is best and highest in Jewish teachings and Jewish traditions."

DR. PAUL NATHAN ON RUSSIA AND THE JEWS.

Letter to Dr. B. Timendorfer, President German Grand Lodge:

Berlin, April 17, 1915.

Having just returned from a journey to Poland, I find your friendly letter of April 10th.

I hastily glanced through the B'nai B'rith News, and I believe that in view of the splendid elucidation on page 8, under the heading, "We Are Not Deceived," it would be quibbling to point out trifling faults. This number of the News furnishes positive proof that our brethren in America not only have the best will to do their utmost for their people in this fateful hour, but that they at the same time clearly understand that promises of the Russian Government amount to nothing and that actions must be demanded.

This is the only correct perception and it is fortunate that our co-religionists in America take this view, for if an improvement can at all be attained in the truly shocking condition of the Jewish population in Russia it can only be achieved through the United States.

I lived to see the pogroms in Russia, I was in Roumania during the persecutions of the Jews and have myself witnessed the grievous sufferings of our co-religionists in the Balkans during the last war between Turkey, Roumania, Servia and Greece. But all these horrible pictures vanish when they are compared with the sufferings which our co-religionists have to endure in Russia and also in those districts of Galicia which are occupied by the Russian troops. I will add here that the sufferings of the Protestants in those countries are just as great, only with this difference: that the number of Jews in those afflicted lands reaches into the millions and the Protestants are only counted by the thousands.

In every place in Poland from which the Russians were forced to withdraw, they completely looted before their retreat the Jewish stores and business places. The exact number of violated women and girls, including children and old women, can naturally never be stated. To these must be added those who have been killed, who have been frivolously hanged upon the slightest suspicion and even without any grounds for suspicion, or were drowned, or carried away into the woods and were there perhaps shot and hidden under ground—at any rate, they have disappeared. And lastly, all the Jewish inhabitants of different places were forced in mid-winter to go back with the retreating Russians to the interior, under the pretext that this was the only way to prevent the Jews from giving dangerous information to the German troops. This, for instance, was the case in Skierniece, and to this exodus were forced also old people, lying-in women with their newly-born children, sick persons, a great many of whom perished miserably in the cold of the Russian winter.

I have collected material about these events and hope soon to be in a position to lay it before the civilized world.

These events are terrible enough in themselves and such frightful tragedies are occuring daily, yet one circumstance makes them even more desperate than the times of the sorrowful pogroms. Then there existed a European public opinion which branded with infamy the Russian abominations and to a certain extent put a stop to barbarity. But today there is no public opinion in Europe which could achieve such a thing. It is self-understood that what one says in Germany today regarding Russia might as well be spoken to the wind, and France and England as the allies of Russia deny themselves the privilege to criticize the Russian barbarity in any emphatic and impressive manner. So the United States alone remains to say a word in behalf of humanity. This should be done and this must constantly be renewed, and I think that the great duty to assume the leadership in this struggle with all the possible force and impressiveness at their command rests with the lodges and the collective Jewish body in the United States.

If under your guidance, worthy Grand President, the German lodges would again appeal to the B'nai B'rith in the United States it would in my estimation result in a great blessing. With this I do not mean to create the impression that in my opinion the attitude of our co-religionists across the ocean today still needs to be corrected, I only mean to express the thought that it is advisable for our brethren to continue in the way they have been proceeding with the highest energy and the highest persistency.

With hearty fraternal greetings in B. B. L. & H. and distinguished esteem,

DR. NATHAN.

THE JEWISH TECHNICUM IN HAIFA

Report of the Hilfsverein der Deutschen Juden.

The Jewish Technicum in Haifa was sold at public auction on March 24. The Jews are entitled to be informed about the events which preceded this auction. The necessity for this explanation is the more pressing because these very events were made use of to place the motives for this public sale in a false light.

It is known that the completion of the building of the Technicum was greatly hampered by the language controversy in Palestine. The administration of the Technicum agreed that a wider field should be allotted to the study of Hebrew in the Haifa institute; that at graduation the students should be so well advanced in Hebrew as to be complete masters in writing and speaking the language of the Bible. In opposition to this it was demanded that the instruction, if not in all the technical branches of study, at least in the greater part of them should be in the Hebrew language. The majority of the curators did not consider it possible to carry out this demand, as at the present time there are neither suitable teachers who are able to instruct in Hebrew in the various branches, nor the right school compendiums in Hebrew. The difference in this purely pedagogical question and the wider discussions became in the end so poignant that the American curators without exception resigned from their offices, for, since they were far away from the seat of the association, they considered themselves not always sufficiently informed, and they therefore preferred to decline further responsibility for the development of the question.

This resignation was highly regrettable but fully comprehensible under the circumstances.

Although the language controversy dealt a hard blow to the undertaking, the responsible leaders of the Technicum still made the attempt to bring about a successful termination of the question.

Up to the time of the opening of the schools of instruction an expenditure of 300,000 marks would have had to be made. Dr. James Simon and Dr. Nathan declared themselves ready to contribute 100,000 marks each toward this expenditure, provided the Wissotzky family would donate an equal amount on similar conditions. The Wissotzky family was not ready to comply and at its session held July 17, of the previous year, the curatorium adopted the following resolution:

"As by the declining attitude of the Commercial Counsellor Wissotzky, the completion of the Technicum is rendered uncertain, the directors are empowered to take such steps as the present situation demands and to announce the winding up of the affairs of the institute."

It must, therefore, be affirmed that the financial condition of the Technicum before the outbreak of the war and before the war was even thought of, had grown so difficult that it became necessary to leave it to the discretion of the administration to go through bankruptcy whenever they saw fit to do so. Although these are the actual facts, still it was maintained that the administration of the Technicum had made use of the outbreak of the war to throw the Technicum into bankruptcy.

After the war had broken out the raising of further funds for the Technicum became a complete impossibility. There was also no money to satisfy the claims of the contractors and to cover the current expenses, so that only by advancing money, the most pressing financial claims could be met, such as bills due, wages for the teachers already engaged, for the bookkeeper, for the watchman, for the payment of taxes, for heating and for taking care of the buildings and the machinery. It should be noted also that a legal consultation with the curators living in Russia and in England had become impossible on account of the European war, so that the entire responsibility and the whole financial burden rested upon the shoulders of the administration. Notwithstanding this the bankruptcy proceedings, which had become an absolute necessity, were postponed from month to month in the hope that by a speedy termination of the war it would be possible to again place the undertaking upon a healthy basis. Only after it became evident that the hope for a quick ending of the war was delusive, fully five months after the curatorium adopted the above resolution leaving it to the discretion of the administration to open bankruptcy proceedings, and then only under the pressure of the growing financial difficulties, was use made of the July resolution. The bankruptcy proceedings of the Technicum were consummated at the end of December, 1914.

It is also false to maintain that by this opening of the bankruptcy proceedings an infringement of the rights of any persons has taken place. No proofs are necessary to show that the Americans were not hindered in any way from giving expression to their interest in the Technicum. As citizens of a neutral state they were fully in a position to do it. Also the Wissotzky family was able to express its will. It only needed to confide its wishes and intentions to a German citizen or to one of a neutral state. But it had positively declined to take such a step. The Zionists, too, have discussed among themselves the measures to be taken. They made offers by which they have created a strong impression that if they saw fit they could maintain their standpoint regarding the Technicum even during the war.

Confidential persons among the Zionists have declared themselves ready to acquire ownership of the Technicum for 150,000 marks, and by assuming an indebtedness of about 20,000 to 25,000 marks. The receiver has refused this bid as too low. The Zionists further expressed the wish that the time for the public auction of the Technicum should be postponed till the close of the war. But as then the question arose who was to furnish the means to cover the running expenses for salaries, taxes, keeping the buildings in repair, etc., etc., the receiver made the proposal to the Zionists negotiators to postpone the time for the public auction of the Technicum for one year, if they would be willing to furnish a sum of money estimated to be needed for the maintenance of the institute during that year in the same manner as it has been maintained heretofore, and if they would make a bid of at least 225,000 marks. This proposition was declined by the Zionists, and so the legally determined public auction of the Technicum has taken place with the result that the Hilfsverein der Deutschen Juden acquired ownership of the Technicum with all appurtenances for the sum of 225,000 marks.

In conclusion it may be proper to offer a brief statement of the sources whence the contributions came which made it possible to build the Technical Institute.

The plan of the Technicum originated with Dr. Nathan, who, after entering into deep study in the Orient and after repeated visits to Palestine, became convinced of the necessity and usefulness of the undertaking for the Orient. He succeeded in interesting the Wissotzky family of Moscow in his project, which became willing to contribute 100,000 roubles to further the plan. With these 100,000 roubles a Wolf Wissotzky foundation was founded by the Hilfsverein der Deutschen Juden as a part of its organization. Then Dr. Nathan also succeeded in inducing Mr. Jacob Schiff of New York to donate $100,000. Mr. Schiff justly called attention to the fact that it would not be desirable to have a foundation to which a number of persons would have to become contributors, bear the name of a single person as the supporter of the entire undertaking. The Wissotzky foundation which was attached to the Hilfsverein was accordingly united with the gift of Mr. Jacob Schiff under the name of Jewish Institute for Technical Training in Palestine. For the carrying on of the undertaking the Hilfsverein der Deutschen Juden then gave two other of its foundations: the foundation of Dr. James Simon, amounting to 100,000 marks, and the Cohn-Oppenheim foundation of 300,000 marks. The Wissotzky family subsequently again donated 100,000 roubles for the establishment of a home for the students upon the grounds of the Technicum. Also this sum was, with the consent of the Wissotzky family, expended for the building of the schools. The Jewish National Fund finally gave 80,000 marks as a mortgage loan for the purchase of ground. The fact must be emphasized that all these transactions were undertaken with the consent of all the interested parties and without the opposition of even one of the curators to any of the arrangements or to any of the terms which had to be made under the existing conditions. The financing of the Technicum shaped itself as follows: The Hilfsverein gave from foundations which belonged to it, the sum of 600,000 marks, to this must be added 60,000 marks which it has advanced, making a total of 660,000 marks contributed by the Hilfsverein der Deutschen Juden; 400,000 were received from Mr. Jacob H. Schiff in New York; the Wissotzky family then added a donation of 200,000 marks to the Wissotzky foundation of the Hilfsverein, with which the Haifa Home Society was founded at the head of which stand Dr. James Simon and Dr. Nathan. Finally there came on the side of the Zionists the sum of 80,000 marks from the Jewish National Fund.

One thing only has been attained by the passing of the Technicum into the possession of the Hilfsverein der Deutschen Juden. Clear conditions have again been created and the financial responsibility for the entire undertaking is no longer uncertain. But the insinuation must be repudiated that by gaining possession of the Technicum the Hilfsverein has in any shape or manner prejudiced the future of the institute. When the institute can be opened and what tendencies shall be followed in conducting the institute, will be determined by the end of the present war, and not by the public sale. The future political developments will be decided by the battles in Belgium, in Poland, in the Dardanelles and at the Suez Canal. According to the way the dies will fall the instruction in the Technicum will have to be shaped, one way or another, in the interests of our Oriental co-religionists. It is impossible to anticipate today what form it will take in the future and every attempt in this direction can only be made by childish politicians.

In having acquired possession of the Technicum the Hilfsverein der Deutschen Juden has only done its duty, even under the most difficult conditions. It saved a great Jewish undertaking from an economically unstable position when no other forces were ready to make similar sacrifices for the purpose of placing it upon a sound basis. Thus the Hilfsverein der Deutschen Juden has taken new heavy burdens upon itself in very stringent times with no other intention than to maintain until peace is concluded free from injury as far as possible that which has already been created in Haifa. Then only will it have to be decided how to bring about a high efficiency in the blessed work of the Technicum for the interests of our co-religionists all over the Orient, according to the new polical conditions.

GOREMYKIN AND MAKLAKOW.

A deputation, consisting of Messrs. Friedmann, Grusenberg and Davidson, was recently received by the Prime Minister of Russia Goremykin. They reported to the Minister the fearful sufferings of the Jews in Poland and asked the government for aid. Goremykin promised to do everything within his power for the suffering Jews. But the Russian Minister of the Interior, Maklakow, positively refused to grant the petition of many Jewish refugees to permit them to stay temporarily outside of the pale. He said that the pale is still ample for all the Jews. But he permitted the Jewish students who had studied in foreign universities and who were allowed to make their examination at Russian universities to stay outside of the pale during the time of examinations.

BROTHER LOUIS KEMPNER HONORED.

At a meeting of Edward Everett Lodge No. 97 of New York City, held on April 5, 1915, Brother Louis Kempner, President of the Board of Governors of the Yonkers Home, and President of the Lodge for three terms, was presented with a beautiful testimonial by the Lodge in recognition of his many services and the esteem in which he is held by the members. Addresses were delivered by Brothers Julius Levy, Bernard M. Kaplan, secretary of the District Grand Lodge, W. A. Ast, H. Duschenes, and others. Brother Kempner made a fitting address.

There was a large attendance at the meeting and at its conclusion refreshments were served.

CONGRESS OF AMERICAN JEWS.

The Provisional Executive Committee for General Zionist Affairs adopted the following resolution at a meeting held on May 9:

"That the opinion of the Provisional Executive Committee for General Zionist Affairs, it is desirable that at the proper time, a Congress of American Jews, convening on a democratic basis should be held, for the consideration of the problems of the Jewish people."

APOSTASY IN RUSSIA.

The Russian Senate has promulgated a law according to which no Jewish children are to be admitted to baptism as long as their parents have not been converted to Christianity.

The Jewish Defense of the Bible

By DR. MAX L. MARGOLIS

Written for the B'nai B'rith News.

In his very interesting Presidential Address to the Union of Jewish Literary Societies, the learned Chief Rabbi of England has dealt among other things with that what might be the Jewish contribution to setting the Bible aright by the publication of a commentary on the Scriptures "by Jews and for Jews and in a Jewish way." It is not my purport here to indicate how far the spiritual head of English Jewry is here reiterating thoughts long ago enunciated on this side of the ocean; nor would it be a difficult matter to point out his indebtedness to American scholars whose very language he has unconsciously absorbed. For while the initiative has come from amongst us, there remains the fact that Dr. Hertz's position enables him to speak with that authority which will mean the sanction of an American enterprise and help not to be spurned in bringing it to the notice of our cousins across the sea.

The need of a Bible commentary in English for the use of Jewish teachers and scholars is obvious indeed. In a previous paper the present writer has dwelt in his own way and without borrowing phrases from men of greater learning on the trend of Bible exposition on the continent of Europe, notably in Germany. That paper, printed in these columns, had the honor of being translated into Yiddish and in this garb it was reprinted in Canada. Surely it may be taken for a sign that the plea there made struck root in the popular feeling. The Jewish people, the masses, may be regarded as the best judge as to what is really needful, as indeed no great undertaking may count on success unless the demand for it comes from below. To sum up our contention of a year ago, the German exposition of the Hebrew Scriptures has been characterized for a century by a spirit of avowed hostility to Jews and Judaism. Martin Schreiner, his mind now unhinged by his people's misery, in a publication which was destined to be his last utterance in print, summed up in a masterly fashion the wrong perpetrated by the anti-Semitic writers from Schleiermacher on in vilifying Judaism and Jewish literature. Blinded by an arrogance of the most blatant kind, steeped in prejudices which though decked up in the trappings of the latest philosophy are as old as the beginnings of the Christian era, they operate on the presumption that Judaism represents an inferior religion and the Hebrew Scriptures a point of view outdistanced by the Christian Bible.

Now we shall be the last to deny that there has been great progress in Biblical learning not of our own making. Humiliating though the fact may be, it were idle to deny it. But it may be well to ascertain its causes, and on the other hand to gauge its extent without ire and without cavil. Before the Reformation Christian Hebraists were few and far between. What is reported about the Hebrew lore of the older Church fathers is not as formidable as the matter stands when reduced to true proportions. Origen and Jerome knew a little Hebrew; they knew it to the extent that with the assistance of a Jew and with the aid of Aquila's literal translation which served them in the stead of a dictionary they could unravel the difficulties of an easy Biblical text. Jerome had a Hebrew teacher in the person of Barannina and Origen consulted the patriarch Rabbi Hillel (the younger). In the fifteenth century Christians hired Jewish scholars to teach them the rudiments of Hebrew grammar. Elias Levita, the teacher of cardinals and princes of the Church, transmitted to Christian theologians the accumulated lore of the Jewish grammarians and commentators. Levita himself was no original mind, but he knew his sources well. Jewish apostates presided over the printing presses of Spain and Italy whence issued now famous prints of the Hebrew Bible. Lyra, the noted commentator, a baptized Jew, opened up Rashi to the Christian world. But the Christians built well upon these foundations. Important discoveries made for progress. Jewish scholars immersed in talmudical studies let the Bible go. When Luzzatto in the nineteenth century took up Bible studies, he had before him a vast array of commentaries and treatises written by Christians. His pupil, Morais, transmitted the master's zeal to these shores. We in Philadelphia are still under the influence of this [illegible] noble zeal.

A personal allusion may be pardoned because it is symptomatic. When nearly a quarter of a century ago the present writer was called to the Cincinnati College, Isaac M. Wise said: "We have plenty of Talmud teachers, we have no Bible scholars among us Jews." By an accident, as it were, my activity was directed into the channels of Bible work. For my first publications lay in the field of the Talmud to which after a number of years I returned just to linger over it for a while and no more. The truth is that even Talmud scholars are nowadays rare. The majority of Jewish students have been impregnated with a distaste for Talmud and Talmudic literature. Steinschneider led the way. He was interested in convincing the world that the Jews in the Middle Ages were the carriers of culture. It was an obsession with him. If he could make known a forgotten treatise in Hebrew on some physical malady he considered his efforts well repaid. He catalogued many Hebrew manuscripts; to the chief glory of the Munich library, the only complete manuscript of the Talmud now made available in reproduction by a Christian scholar, he devotes a few lines miscopying the date in the bargain. Christian scholars may well point out that the world respects individuality and that the soul of the Jew is far better revealed in Talmud and Midrash than in post-talmudic literature. But what are the bulk of Jewish scholars engaged in today. Look at their publications and find that they deal for the most part with scraps in which the Jewish soul is least manifest. And the Torah, she is consigned to oblivion in a corner.

If we are to undertake the Jewish defence of the Bible, and undertake it we must, we need Jewish students of the Bible. In some quarters they say that Bible study is not a part of Jewish scholarship. Add to it that the man in the street believes that the Bible which is in everybody's hands needs no elucidation and it ought to be clear how small is the number of workers in this field. The truth is that Bible exposition requires a training and preparation which few are willing to undergo. Of course as long as the feeling prevails that anybody and everybody may try his hand at it and that, over night as it were, a Bible teacher may be created, we shall simply not have the article we are so sorely in need of. In the pioneer days of twenty-five years ago it used to be believed that you might take a Jew and put a humesh in his hand and thereby ordain him a teacher of the Bible. We live in the era of specialization. The man who can put his hand to more than one field of labor is an authority in none. A man-for-all-work is a poor person to rely on in labor requiring skill and technique.

If we are to defend the Jewish Bible, we must be able to cope with the non-Jew. We must know the things he knows and do the things he does as well and a good deal better. We cannot demolish criticism by ignoring it. If we have something positive to bring to the world, the world may listen to us. But we cannot convert the world to our view by scolding, be it never so couched in fine epigrams. Entrenched in hatred and prejudice, the critic will not be dislodged unless we assail him by his own weapons. Lagarde, the arch anti-Semite, long ago said that no man can interpret the Pentateuch without a knowledge of the halakah. But a mere knowledge of the halakah will not constitute a Bible commentator. Malbim has shown that the halakists knew their Hebrew well and that for every comment of theirs there was a foundation in the Scriptural Word. But that is far from maintaining that the Bible word really means what the rabbis put into it. Know the rabbinical expositions we must, but at the same time we must know how to discriminate between imputed meanings and the original purport. For all of which we need discernment, the discernment which comes from long and laborious preparation. We must show that we know language and grammar better than the Christian. We must prove that we also can consult authorities at first hand in regions not explored in the heder. The Jewish expounder of the Bible must be at home in patristic literature as well as in Mishnah and Talmud and Midrash. Mere ability to read Rashi does not constitute a Bible scholar, just as little as mere ability to consult a modern commentary in German or English makes of a man an authority in Biblical learning. There is not a verse, there is not a word in the Bible that has not a long history of interpretation behind it which one must know, and know at once and for immediate use. Scholarship is made up of two assets: a prerequisite knowledge of where to look for things and a ready acquaintance with the things to be looked for. A moneyed man may have a fat bank-account; but to buy groceries you have to have ready change. In the region of learning, the knowledge of sources is a valuable bank-account; but the possession of the knowledge drawn from many obscure sources is the ready cash. And that knowledge is found only in men of experience, who have behind them and not ahead of them the preparation. How many such men will the Chief Rabbi of England find in the English speaking world?

ANNUAL CONVENTION OF DISTRICT GRAND LODGE NO. 7.

The forty-second Annual Convention of District Grand Lodge No. 7 I. O. B. B. was held at New Orleans, La., April 11 and 12.

According to instruction received prior to the election of delegates, each lodge sent one delegate only, and these representatives came to the convention with the full understanding that they were to devote themselves strictly to business and not waste a minute. This action was taken with the view of reducing expenses in order that the Grand Lodge may give the money saved to the relief fund for the war sufferers. For the same reason all semblance of entertainment was also eliminated.

The convention was opened at ten o'clock on Sunday morning at the Hotel De Soto by the out-going president, Brother Leo Goodman, of Memphis, Tenn. After an invocation by Rabbi Mendel Silber, the Past-President degree was conferred upon fifteen delegates.

President Goodman then read his message which, though brief, was a stirring document. He stated that the membership of the District was 5,400; that District No. 7 has contributed $12,212.68 to the fund collected by the Order for the benefit of the war sufferers, and he referred to the fact that the convention marked the twenty-fifth anniversary of Brother Nat. Strauss as Grand Secreary.

A resolution was then adopted to extend to Brother Secretary Nat Strauss the thanks of the members of the District and to present him a silver tablet, suitably engraved, to commemorate the twenty-five years of the loyal and efficient service rendered to the Order by this faithful Ben B'rith who has now reached the advanced age of eighty years.

The election of officers for the ensuing year resulted as follows:

President—Nathan Cohn.

First Vice-President — Ernest Bernstein.

Second Vice-President—Ralph Schwarz.

Third Vice-President—Sol Schoeneman.

Sergeant-at-Arms—A. Leo. Oberdorffer.

Treasurer—A. A. Marx.

Secretary—Nat Strauss.

Treasurer Marx was re-elected for the nineteenth time and Secretary Strauss was elected for life.

The newly elected officers were installed by Brother Joseph Hirsh, of Vicksburg, in a very impressive manner.

On assuming the chair President Cohn addressed the convention, pledging his service in the work of advancing B'nai B'rith interests in the District, being aware of the fact that office without service brings neither satisfaction nor honor to the incumbent. "Mighty problems," he continued, "such as never before in Israel, confront the Order. It behooves the members to bring to their consideration all the thought, loyalty, self-sacrifice and sympathy they possess. The stupendous struggle between many nations brings new problems and intensifies old ones. It is not the time for discussion, but to pledge co-operation and to join in prayer for divine guidance. As great as are these problems the District must not relegate to the rear the tender charities which have been the pride and the glory of the Order. The latter was not a mere alms gatherer. The welfare of the orphan, the relief of the sick and needy, the establishment of havens of rest for the aged, are constructive work which challenge the highest qualities of head and heart. These must not be brushed aside, but cherished equally with the new duties made compulsory."

Among the visitors to the convention was Brother Sol Marx, the oldest Ben B'rith in the South, he having joined the Order in New York fifty-nine years ago.

A number of important resolutions were presented at the afternoon session, among them one providing for a fund to be created by monthly contributions on the part of the members for the alleviation of distress among our European and Palestinian brethren who are victims of the present war; another, which called for a yearly contribution towards a fund that will enable a committee, especially appointed for the purpose, to care for the wards of the Jewish Orphan's Home after they are discharged from the institution.

A recess was taken to give the delegates a chance to visit the Touro Infirmary and the Orphan's Home.

At the executive session which was opened at 8 o'clock p. m. and lasted until midnight, the secretary's report was read which called forth earnest deliberations, touching upon the most vital interests of the Order, in which every delegate participated.

During the following two sessions on Monday, reports and resolutions were presented, discussed and adopted; committees appointed and ways and means considered for advancing the cause of the Order and the interests of Judaism. A movement was started to purchase tillable lands and undertake colonization and agricultural training in connection with the influx expected after the European war.

Sociological work will be undertaken, rabbis and other members in each state of the District being appointed to visit the prisons, asylums, hospitals and other institutions and look after the welfare of Jewish inmates and patients. Intellectual culture work was also expanded and vitalized.

The next convention will be held at Little Rock, Ark.

The great volume of important work accomplished by the convention in so short a time demonstrated the fact that the Order B'nai B'rith is a great power for good, a living force full of inspiring ideals in the service of Israel and humanity.

DEPORTATION OF IMMIGRANTS TO RUSSIA PREVENTED.

A Committee of the Hebrew Sheltering and Immigrant Aid Society of America, consisting of Judge Leon Sanders, its President, Isidore Hershfield, a member of the Law Committee, Mr. Louis S. Gotlieb, one of its representatives at Washington, and Mr. Samuel Littman, who represents the Society at Ellis Island, attended a hearing before Secretary Wilson of the Department of Labor in order to oppose the deportation of immigrants to Russia via the port of Archangel.

Since the beginning of the War, several hundred immigrants who were found ineligible for admission were released on the filing of a bond guaranteeing their return from the United States to their native country when deportation could be effected with safety, and an effort was made by the immigration authorities to send them back on the Russian-American Line, holding that such deportation could now be made with safety. The Society felt, however, that the lives of these immigrants would be endangered if they were to return, first because of the possibility of attack on the steamer, secondly because of the risks of submarines, and thirdly because ammunition of war might be carried on board the vessel, and for these reasons vigorously opposed the various efforts to deport these immigrants.

Judge Sanders procured from George Kennan, the famous authority on conditions in Russia, a telegram reading as follows:

> "Deported immigrants sent to Southern Russia by etape from Archangel would have to travel one thousand to twelve hundred miles, as railroads are crowded with troops and war munitions. Immigrants would have to go on foot at rate of fifteen miles a day. They would march under guard with common criminals and would be herded with latter in dirty, infected prisons at night with inevitable delays. Journey would occupy three to four months and would be attended with great hardships, privations and risks. Most of weaker members would probably die from exposure and disease. I doubt very much our moral right to subject human beings to such an experience. We are trying to relieve suffering and prevent death in Russia, but by returning these people we should increase both."

This telegram, together with other documentary evidence and the arguments presented by the Committee, made a deep impression on Secretary Wilson, and accordingly he cancelled indefinitely the deportation of these immigrants.

Most of those affected were not Jews, but the Society felt in duty bound to protect the interests of all immigrants, regardless of their creed or faith.

NEWS FROM LONDON

By Our Correspondent Dr. M. Epstein

London, May 21, 1915.

March 31, 1915, will continue for long to be a memorable day in Anglo-Jewish history. It was the day on which Lord Rothschild died. Much has been written of his life, of his wealth, of his influence, and readers of the NEWS have likewise been given the details. There is no need therefore to expatiate upon them. A few facts of interest need only be added. Those who knew him speak of his exceeding great love of children, and students of Ruskin will recall how much that great writer attached to this quality as a criterion of character. Yet Lord Rothschild's manner was said to have been brusque. Nevertheless his heart was gold. His philanthropy was not merely a tradition with him, not merely a case of noblesse oblige, but really came from his heart. He was charitable because he felt like it. That his charity was large everybody knows. His name had a sort of magic for all classes of Jews. His co-religionists in the East End of London more especially looked up to him as retainers might to their overlord. The day of his funeral was a day of grief for the London ghetto. We saw ourselves how the motor omnibusses that ply between Whitechapel and Willesden (where the Jewish cemetery of the West is situated), were literally packed with Jews. Young and old came out; the vehicles did not stop at their accustomed halting places because the ordinary passengers were unable to get in. So they came in streams—in motorbusses, in taxis; some stood at the street corners where the funeral procession was expected to pass; others walked on foot to the place of sepulchre. And in the ground itself could be seen cabinet ministers and representatives of royalty, prominent city merchants and bankers. Jew and Gentile alike paid their respects to the great dead.

For the Gentile, Nathaniel, first Baron Rothschild, stood as one of the best types of Englishman—a regular John Bull, one of his friends called him. He was a country gentleman in the best sense of the term, beloved and respected by his tenants; he was interested in local and national public affairs. But it was in the city that his greatest influence was wielded. There he added fresh distinction to an honored name among England's merchant princes and contributed much to the wealth and dignity of the chief financial center of the world. It is significant that in a time of crisis such as the horrible war now upon us, he was consulted and listened to by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. No wonder the English press, without exception, gave him his due; and all shades of opinion regretted the passing of a great Englishman.

For the Jew the late Baron was a kind of family head. "The uncrowned king of the Jews" he has been called, and there was more in that title than would appear at a first glance. For kingly he was in his conduct towards Jewish communal life. Congregational activities owed much to him and many a literary venture would have come to grief but for his assistance. No Jewish charity in the kingdom but could count on his aid. while some were his pet enterprises. Family tradition associated him with the Jews' Free School, that enormous pile in Bell Lane, possibly the largest elementary school in the world. The Rothschilds were its nursing fathers, more especially a decade or two ago, when the State had not yet learned to maintain education as adequately as it does today. Twice a year each child received a suit of clothes and a pair of boots—a present from Lord Rothschild. As for books, miscellaneous gifts to teachers, the provision of the school library, the institution of joinery and metal workshops—the wherewithal for these came from New Court. Nor was the relationship with the school merely that of a cash nexus. Far from it. Some one from the family attended committee meetings and made it his business to know what was happening. And if an actual member of the family could not come, a secretary was invariably sent. Once a lady asked Lord Rothschild for facilities to see the Jewish institutions of the East End. He sent one of his secretaries to show her what could be shown in a couple of crowded days. As they went through one of the grimy streets of Jewish Whitechapel, the secretary suddenly perceived a woman of the poorest class dragging behind her a child with legs badly bowed—a case of neglected rickets. With an exclamation "That will never do!" he left his companion's side, spoke to the woman, took some notes, and returned, briefly explaining that the child would be seen to till it was cured. Sickly children of all sorts were sent to the sea and convalescent homes. Clever boys and youths were helped. It was not wholesale but considered generosity. Moreover, it was dispensed in the good old Jewish spirit. Matan baseser, unostentatious charity, was the motto at New Court.

There can be no doubt that Lord Rothschild did a very great deal in the direction of philanthropy, both for Jews and generally. With the increasing demands that made themselves felt in recent years, it became necessary to set limits to the old activities, and it is more than probable that now the aid from this source, while extensive still, will not be as large as it used to be. Still, the family continues; its interest is alive; and the ancient traditions are not likely to die out.

But in Anglo-Jewry Lord Rothschild was more than a mere dispenser of charity. He was a force, an institution, a power that bore up the past. The old order changeth—and well for the world that it does. When a man like Lord Rothschild is gathered to his fathers, this is an appropriate text. For with him goes the last remnant of a previous age, which, either because of the respect due to it or the influence it can wield, stands in the way of progress. Lord Rothschild enjoyed both respect and influence. Recently when Anglo-Jewry was engaged in a vital decision that would affect the future, the prevailing public opinion wanted one thing and Lord Rothschild another. "Who would care to shoulder the responsibility of crossing him?" asked one prominent communal worker. What was the result? Lord Rothschild got his way, and for another generation or two Anglo-Jewry will, so far as this particular question is concerned, walk in the path he chose for it.

No doubt it is good to have such restraining forces in a community; they certainly win respect when their genuineness is as apparent as was Lord Rothschild's. But one day they must pass away. It is a law of development. Young men must replace the old; new ideas take the place of those outworn. Lord Rothschild's death was, therefore, of exceeding great significance from the communal point of view. Some one once called the late Chief Rabbi "the dead hand on Judaism." He meant ,of course, in England. "The dead hand on Jewish life" might appropriately be the parallel phrase applicable to Lord Rothschild. We do not criticise him in making the assertion. We but state a fact. His world-outlook, so far as Jews were concerned, could not but be largely influenced by the experiences of his earlier days. Jews then appealed for kind treatment. They bowed under the burden of special legislation. They had the look of terror which you may see in the eyes of a beaten dog. They paid readily for favors—as they do in Russia at the present day. It took two, three generations for them to win their self-respect. It was not until the twentieth century set in that they began to speak of their rights. Now, obviously, the point of view of an outlook such as Lord Rothschild could not but have was very different from that held by the majority of modern Jews everywhere. Consequently there was the clash of opinions. Consequently, it may with justice be said that the future historian while paying tribute (and it will be large), to Lord Rothschild's personality, will have to indicate that his death was a landmark in Anglo-Jewish history, inasmuch as the forces of today would now be able the more easily to wrest influence from the forces of yesterday.

If we were still enjoying the peace which last summer we thought was assured, it would be interesting to speculate how the trend of things in English Jewry would be. But today, amid the clash of arms, amid the cries of passion, what shall one say? How we envy our brethren in the United States! There, at any rate, you may go on building. We must wait, watching the while how war makes men mad, how moral issues are darkened, how the foundations of society are loosed. All the evil forces seem to have come to the top in Europe—hate and loathing, mercilessness and cruelty, wrong and falsehood. You cannot explain the world except by saying that it is at the moment the lunatic asylum of the spheres. And when the madness cools, what then? What of the Jewish position in the world? What of the development of Anglo-Jewry? We have no time to think—or, indeed, is there anyone thinking, making ready for the day of commencing anew? The country as a whole has but one goal at present—the successful carrying through of the war. To that we direct our minds—and, one must add, in the circumstances, rightly so. But what of the future? The economic problem alone will be stupendous. And if the nation, in the nature of things, does not already set about solving it, is it any wonder that the community does not begin to set its house in order. Little things to be sure there are. Many people are learning Hebrew as a language. You may find in this great London of ours small groups of men and women who meet for occasional Hebrew conversation. They are talking of bringing out a Hebrew Journal. The old, "Zionist," while not able to appear as of yore, is arranging for a series of pamphlets on aspects of Zionism. The Jewish Historical Society of England has just brought out the seventh volume of Transactions. All these are for the good. But they do not build for the future. Moreover, immediate and special problems have to be faced. The government are about to intern enemy aliens, among whom, of course, a large number of Jews are to be found. They need assistance and direction, to say nothing of money. Wives will be left penniless; business that kept small families may have to be neglected. The Jew must help in these cases. He has ever borne the burden of his poor in this country. He will do so still. And we are glad to be able to add that all this will mean more work for the lodge to undertake. It will not fail.

So then a large policy for the future of Anglo-Jewry seems pretty well impossible just now. Besides, what of the Jews in the war zones? What of Palestine? Truly, we dwell in darkness. And yet, let it not be imagined that we are despondent. It is the curse of war that brings black thoughts to the mind. But while war lasts it must be borne. And Jews bear with the rest. We are British citizens. We nurse the wounded, we work for the poor, we give our portion of the fighting strength; aye, and we lay down our lives for our land. Recently two losses from the front moved us especially. One was the death of the son of the Rev. J. F. Stern, a brilliant youth, who from the point of view of the community, showed promise of great things. A university man of distinction, he was just the sort of stuff of which our future leaders must be made. Equally touching was the loss sustained by our own Brother Augustus Kahn, whose nephew, an only child, gave his life for England. These are not isolated cases, and we can well realize that the Jews, the world over, are losing their young strength—just as we are doing. Is there not one hope, in face of these things, a hope that all soberminded men should cherish, that Jews should especially work for? Let us have peace—peace among nations, peace between individuals and the greatest peace of all, the pace of God, which is inward peace.

The recent annual meeting at each of the synagogues that belong to the United Synagogue was characterized by a certain interest in extra-synagognal affairs which was good to see. At almost all of them in London, north, south, east and west, one or both of the following resolutions was put: (1) That it is desirable that the representative of this congregation to the Board of Deputies should meet the members of the congregation at a general meeting at least once in each year to report and consult with them upon the work of the Board. (2) That in view of the serious questions affecting Jews that may come up for settlement after the war, it be an instruction to our representative at the Board of Deputies to further by every available means on behalf of this congregation, all measures which aim at securing: (a) For the Jews in all countries equal rights with their fellow citizens; (b) The recognition of a special Jewish interest in Palestine. The resolution or resolutions were on the whole well received, and the London lodge was specially interested to note that it is possible to stir up interest in the London synagogues in the larger Jewish questions of the day. This is something new, and looks promising. It need only be added that in almost every case, one of our brethren was the mover of the resolution.

We desire to place on record the individual and corporate expression of sympathy on the part of every member of the lodge, with our first President and one of our founders, Brother Herbert Bentwich, on the grievous loss he has sustained by the death of his wife, on the first day of Pentecost. Others will tell of the social and charitable activities of the late Mrs. Bentwich; for us it is fitting to lay stress on her personality. Beto zu ishto, the Rabbis used to say; the statement was seldom more appropriate than in the case of Brother Bentwich. Everyone knows how ideal the home life was in his house; every one knows that its spirit was intensely Jewish. The soul of that home was its mother; and she was a great woman. "Her children rise up and call her blessed." Yes, indeed, the true mother's influence is best seen in her children, and the late Mrs. Bentwich was a model of noble worth. She is a loss to the community, but her example lives. We can only hope that Brother Bentwich will find some comfort in the assurance that from the bottom of our hearts our sympathy goes out to him and his dear ones.

GEORG BRANDES ON POLISH ANTI-SEMITES.

Georg Brandes, the famous Danish author, has recently published another article in the Politigen against the Polish pogrom-agitators and Jew-baiters. It is a fresh and severe accusation against the Poles, for whom he "perhaps more strongly than any other non-Pole now living has shown his affection." Dr. Brandes writes: "If the pogroms had been arranged by the mob nothing could have been said against their act, for it would have been the same in Poland as was the case at Kishineff and elsewhere in Russia itself. Just what makes me speak is the enormous difference between the circumstances in Russia and those in Russian Poland, the fact that while in Russia all the best authors, men such as Korolenko, Andrejew, Gorki, all the inintellectuals of the country are on the side of the Jews and consider the pogrom-agitation a shame and disgrace, the Polish intellectuals, such as Niemojewski and Swientochowski, have put themselves at the head of the movement against the Jews, and thus clearly proved how remote from true culture the Polish intellect stands at present compared with the Russian intellect. This is the main point and cannot be helped. The mischief has been done; and I do not write this without reflection, but in full and justified earnestness. It is the existences and lives of thousands and thousands of human beings, which are at stake. They fall victims to medieval prejudices, which it should be the task of the intellectual aristocracy to obliterate rather than encourage."

In his further remarks Brandes scourges the cowardice of the Polish intellectuals, whose club of political authors and journalists has not, according to their usual method, ventured to admit, nor to reject, the former severe accusations against Poland by means of a collective protest, but has been content to give an insignificant explanation without one word of detestation of the pogroms. On the contrary, Brandes states with horror that the whole Polish Press, except a single paper, Kurjer Ĺodzki, is anti-Semitic. He mentions ten daily and four illustrated papers in the Polish capital which sometimes moderately and sometimes fanatically preach anti-Semitism. He even knows of two papers for children, both of which are completely in the hands of anti-Semites. The provincial papers without exception are anti-Semitic. Having summed up all these facts Brandes adds a reproduction of an illustration in Wiarus, the Polish democratic paper. The heading of the picture is "Religious Murder," and the letterpress below is: Picture of the Jews murdering a Christian child to procure its blood for the manufacture of the unleavened bread as was also adopted in the Beilis case.

Brandes ends thus: In the European Press I have seen many things of which any honourable man feels ashamed. But never in my life have I seen anything more shameless than this.—London "Chronicle".

Convention of District Grand Lodge No. 2

I. O. B. B.

District Grand Lodge No. 2 met in annual session at Columbus, Ohio, on Sunday morning, May 30, 1915.

Invocation was made by Brother Dr. Samuel Wolfenstein, of Cleveland.

Addresses of welcome were delivered on behalf of the city of Columbus by Honorable George J. Karb, Mayor, and on behalf of Zion Lodge, No. 62, of Columbus, by Brother Simon Lazarus. Response was made by Brother Samuel J. Kornhauser, First Vice-President of the Grand Lodge.

The Message of the President of the District, Brother Dr. Joseph S. Kornfeld, dealt with relief measures undertaken by the District and Jewry at large, on behalf of the European sufferers.

The President, in his message, emphasized the need of a permanent emergency relief fund. Referring to the Cleveland Jewish Orphan Asylum, the erection of another institution in some part of the District or the enlargement of the facilities of the present institution was urged.

The work of the National Jewish Hospital in Denver, the Leo N. Levi Memorial Hospital in Hot Springs, and the Educational League of Cleveland, was strongly commended. The creation of the Anti-Defamation League was justified.

The report of the Secretary of the Grand Lodge showed a healthy condition both from the standpoint of membership and finance. The membership of the district has passed the six thousand mark.

The reports of the Officers, Chairmen of Standing Committees, and of the Charitable and Educational Institutions, were considered during the day's session.

Towards evening, a round-table discussion was led by representatives of Cincinnati Lodge on the subject, "How to Conduct a Campaign for Members."

"The Covenant of our Brotherhood," was the subject of an address, on Sunday evening on the occasion of a reception held in Bryden Road Temple, by Brother Harry Cutler, of Providence, who said among other things:

"The Jewish people stand for peace. Wars they do not start, and no people deplore battle and bloodshed more than they. The Jewish people of this country are as one in their hope that the United States may never again be compelled to engage in war, and they are mindful of the fact that this country never has buckled on the sword except in the cause of humanity. But, much as they oppose war, if there does come a call to arms, the Jews will be to the fore to do their share. Let it be noted that of the twenty-one Americans who lost their lives at Vera Cruz three of them were Jews."

Discussing race caricatures and defamation, Colonel Cutler pointed to the stand of the B'nai B'rith against the press, stage and motion pictures in this regard. Everyone who lives cleanly, he said, opposes caricature and defamation of the race of which he is a member. He said the organization stood not only against caricature and defamation of the Jew, but of any other race as well. B'nai B'rith, he said, is an organization of so broad a scope that its purposes embrace all Jews of all classes and countries.

"The most Orthodox, the most idealistic Zionist, the most radical of the reformed Jew—there is a place for all of them in B'nai B'rith," he said. "This international brotherhood stands for the unity of Israel, and it requires all of Israel to solve the problems with which it has to deal."

Declarations against war, support of President Wilson in his steps taken both prior to and following the sinking of the Lusitania, and expressions of hope that the president will be able to keep the United States out of the conflict which has engulfed Europe were contained in the report of the committee on national and international questions submitted Monday at the second day's session.

"The absorbing question of the critical period through which we are passing" says the report on national and international questions, "is the awful scourge of war which has fallen upon a large portion of the civilized world. Our organization, consecrated to work for the good of our fellow men and recognizing as one of its essential principles that of living at peace with all mankind is called upon to declare its attitude toward the present emergency of the hour.

"We share the feelings of joy and satisfaction which must pervade the great majority of our fellow citizens over the firm, calm and high-minded manner in which the President of the United States has dealt with the perplexing situation [illegible] our government, and we confidently hope that he will guide the ship of state through the troubled waters into a haven of safety. As Jews, we firmly cling to the ancient prophetic truth that nation shall not lift up sword against nation and shall practice war no more. The sublime ideal, this supreme consummation devoutly to be wished, has been embodied in the ritual of our order in these words of the prophet: The work of righteousness shall be peace and the effect of righteousness shall be rest and security forever.'

"If there ever was a time in human history when the grandeur of these principles and the necessity of realizing them in the larger life of mankind should force themselves upon the attention of the thinking world, it is now, and we should remind ourselves of our duty at all times, within and without the lodge, to be the advocates of international arbitration and the champions of universal peace and brotherhood."

Monday Session.

After reading of the minutes, the President appointed the standing committees, whereupon a recess was ordered to enable the various committees to consider the subject matters referred to them.

Towards the close of the morning session the reports of Committees on Social Service, and Industrial Removal and Employment, were presented and considered. The morning session was brought to a close with an address by brother Jacob Furth on "The Work of the San Francisco Convention." Brother Furth delivered a splendid account of the Convention of the Order and of its activities, aims, and aspirations, at the conclusion of which the thanks and appreciation of the Convention were conveyed by the President to Brother Furth for his address.

A luncheon for delegates was given at the Hotel.

The early part of the afternoon session was devoted to round-table discussion on "How to Stimulate Interest in the Lodge," which took up nearly two hours.

Brother Jacob L. Lorie, upon request, addressed the Convention on "General Welfare of the Order."

In the evening an informal entertainment was given by the local committee, at the Southern Hotel, consisting of a combination Minstrel Show, Cabaret, and Vaudeville entertainment.

Tuesday Session.

Reports of various Committees were presented and considered.

Cleveland was chosen as the meeting place for the next annual Convention. Election of officers was the last order of business, and the following were elected:

Samuel J. Kornhauser, of Cleveland, President.

Carl M. Vetsberg, of St. Louis, First Vice-president.

Louis Borinstein, of Indianapolis, Second Vice-President.

Members of the General Committee—Joseph S. Kornfeld, of Columbus; Jacob L. Lorie of Kansas City; A. Kolinski of Cleveland; Joseph Stampfer of St. Louis; Moses Schwab of Cincinnati; Harry Levinson of Toledo; Joseph Seligman of Louisville.

Victor Abraham, of Cincinnati, Secretary.

William Ornstein, of Cincinnati, Treasurer.

Alfred M. Cohen, of Cincinnati, President of Court of Appeals.

The closing hour of the Convention was taken up with a report of the Committee on Resolutions extending thanks to the City authorities, the local B'nai B'rith Lodge, and the Committee on Arrangements, for courtesies and hospitalities extended to the delegates.

Report of Committee on Resolutions.

Language can hardly express our appreciation of our splendid treatment in the home of our District President, Rabbi Joseph Kornfeld. We feel that between him and his people there must be mutual pride, each in and for the other. Here in Columbus hospitality, warm and genuine, has been generously lavished upon us, and it is with pleasure that we express our appreciation. We are grateful to Brother Col. Harry Cutler for his attendance at our deliberations and for the eloquent and logical address which he delivered at Temple B'nai Israel, entitled "The Covenant of Our Brotherhood," and to the local newspapers for their fair and kindly references to our deliberations.

To Hon. George J. Karb, Mayor of Columbus, for the warmth of friendship and kindly greeting which characterized his address of welcome.

The members of Zion Lodge, No. 62, are entitled to and hereby tendered our heartfelt thanks. They have left nothing undone to make our stay among them a pleasant and memorable page in our life. No detail necessary for our comfort or convenience was omitted. Our welcome has been hearty and sincere, our stay here joyful, satisfactory and beneficial, and we will carry away with us only the most delightful recollections of Columbus and the hospitality and high ideals of our brethren of the Order. Certain it is that the success which they are achieving is well deserved.

We would be justified in making special mention of those members of Zion Lodge whose minds, hearts and hands have so tirelessly devised and executed in our behalf, but they are so numerous that we acknowledge our obligation to all alike, for each has well done his duty, and they have been ably assisted by the ladies of the local committee who also have well done their part as only good women can do and do. Coupled with and reinforcing our appreciation, is that of our visiting ladies, who are grateful for the many kind attentions showered upon them. They join in this expression of commendation and gratitude.

Be it resolved, therefore, that a copy of this report be sent to the B'nai B'rith News for publication and a copy be transmitted to Zion Lodge, No. 62.

A tribute was paid to the retiring president, Brother Joseph S. Kornfeld, and a vote of appreciation to Brother Harry Cutler for his services in addressing the Convention.

The Convention thereupon adjourned sine die.

FRANKFURT LODGE.

Official Visit of President Timendorfer.

On the occasion of the celebration of its 26th anniversary, Frankfurt Lodge, of Frankfurt o. t. M., extended an invitation to Brother B. Timendorfer, President of the German Grand Lodge, to deliver an address before the lodge on April 10th. In his address Brother Timendorfer gave information regarding the Moritz Manheimer foundation.

The purpose of this foundation is to award a prize annually for a paper in which the theme of "Love of Humanity, Justice and Tolerance" is treated. Eighty papers were received in answer to the first prize offer in 1914, to four of which were allotted prizes.

Frankfurt Lodge has now a membership of 484. The lodge held 26 meetings during the past year with an average attendance of 100 members. Twelve lectures were delivered in the lodge room on a variety of interesting subjects.

The Toynbee Hall, established by the lodge, was always well attended, the average attendance being about 450 every evening. The sessions of the Toynbee Hall were discontinued on account of the war, but they will be resumed as soon as possible.

The lodge has appropriated 3,000 marks in aid of small Jewish communities.

The Home for Girls, established by the Lodge was removed to its own quarters, which are furnished with all modern hygienic appliances and comforts. A festival held for the benefit of this Home netted more than 20,000 marks.

The Lodge has appointed a committee for the purpose of extending the work of caring for psychopaths and sufferers from nervous and mental disorders.

The employment bureau of the Lodge succeeded in placing a large number of unemployed Jews in steady positions.

The Lodge is furthering the work of the Union of the German Students of the Jewish Faith and the Society for the Advancement of the Science of Judaism.

The Lodge has given 3,000 marks to the Central Jewish Welfare Society, 2,000 marks to the General War Fund in Frankfurt, 3,000 marks to the Hospital Train, to which sum the Ladies' Auxiliary of the Lodge added 1,000 marks; 300 marks to the Red Crescent, and has collected a large amount of clothing for distribution among those who were driven out from Austria and East Prussia.

Frankfurt Lodge has with the help of its Ladies' Auxiliary established and maintained since the beginning of the war a refuge for single men in need of shelter.

The stress of the war has not deadened the interest of the members in the lodge-life; on the contrary, the noble purposes for which the Lodge has been working has greatly augmented and strengthened the feeling of union among the brethren.

The Lodge had a capital at the end of the year of 175,740 marks and has received gifts to the amount of 8,967.74 marks.

BEN B'RITH AT THE UNITED STATES NAVAL ACADEMY AT ANNAPOLIS.

Probably for the first time in the history of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith has this order enjoyed the distinction of being represented among the cadets at the United States Naval Academy, at Annapolis. The young Ben B'rith who has received this honor is Louis B. Pelzman, of Washington, D. C. Young Pelzman is a member of Argo Lodge, and is the youngest member both in point of age, being only 18, and in point of time, having been initiated in April of this year. He is the brother of Frederick M. Pelzman, Esq., President of Argo Lodge.

The announcement of young Pelzman's appointment was the signal for an avalanche of felicitations from his brothers in B'nai B'rith as well as from his large host of friends and acquaintances.

It is especially worthy of note that the designation of young Pelzman as cadet was made by no less a personage than the distinguished President of the United States, and, as far as it is possible to ascertain, this is the first time in the history of the Nation's Capital, that a Jewish young man has been selected from that city to Annapolis, and also the first time that a President has conferred this distinction upon a Jewish boy.

While the appointment is naturally a marked distinction for the young man, it is only fair to the ensign-to-be to state that the designation is but a fitting reward to his perseverance, tact, and student-ability, and is the result of one of the keenest and closest competitions ever held in Washington. Twenty-five applicants entered the contest for the two coveted appointments at the Academy, and out of this number not a few were the sons and relatives of prominent army and navy officers or those of high government officials. But through sheer ability young Pelzman overcame these handicaps and triumphed over the entire class of 25.

Throughout his school days, the future officer maintained a high rank in his class graduating among the first. Of military bearing, clean-cut and gentlemanly, he has won several prizes in the high school cadets for excellence in drilling, and doubtless this was one of the determining factors in his selection of a career. He then entered the competitive examinations and after close study and preparation of the hardest kind he received the reward of effort.

Argo Lodge of the District of Columbia and B'nai B'rith are to be congratulated on the splendid representative that is going to the Academy. Modest and manly, courteous and firm, with a pleasing personality, young Pelzman is sure to make a splendid impression among his fellow students.

The appointment of Young Pelzman to Annapolis recalls the fact that his brother, Frederick M. Pelzman, the present President of Argo Lodge, had the distinction of leading the high school cadets to victory several years ago. He was also instrumental in bringing the uniform chapter of the Washington Knights of Pythias to a ranking position in the order, and, in the annual encampments of that organization, Captain Pelzman led his company in capturing the first prize at Milwaukee, Wisconsin, and again, last year at Terre Haute, Ind., he succeeded in annexing another medal to his collection for excellence in drilling.

The young cadet is the son of Mr. and Mrs. Herman Pelzman. Mr. Pelzman is a Ben B'rith and his other son, Dr. Ivy Pelzman, is House Surgeon at Fordham Hospital, New York.

JEWS AS SOLDIERS.

More than two thousand Jews in the German army have been awarded the Iron Cross.

A number of Jewish soldiers in the Russian army were decorated with the Order of St. George and thirty-six members of the Byalistock Jewish Red Cross Field Company were recommended to the Czar for awards for bravery.

The chief commander of the Turkish fighting forces, Enver Pasha, expressed himself as follows about the Jews in the Turkish army: "In the Turkish army the Jews belong among the best soldiers. Every one is in his place and their death-despising heroism is well known. Against their deadly enemy, the Russians, they rush with fanatical hatred. It is only natural that among those whom we decorate there are a great many Jews. We could notice the heroic demeanor of the Jews in the Balkan war and we, therefore, bestow upon them the highest military positions. One of my aid-de-camps is of the Jewish faith and a few days ago I promoted two Jews to the rank of Colonel. Their loyalty is constant and, next to the Turks, they are the best soldiers.

A REVIVAL OF B'NAI B'RITHISM IN CINCINNATI.

A revival of interest and enthusiasm has recently evinced itself in Cincinnati Lodge No. 4. This lodge, which holds the position as the largest in the order and numbers about 750 members, has recently inaugurated a campaign to bring the Cincinnati Lodge No. 4 to the front as one of the most active and influential lodges in the country. President Harry H. Friedman, in keeping with this policy, appointed several "live wire" committees to obtain these ends.

President Friedman conceived the idea of appointing two membership committees, one representing the married men and the other the single men of the lodge, thereby stimulating a rivalry which promised adequate results. The Entertainment Committee has been active and practically doubled the normal attendance through its efforts. At the past several meetings, one evening was devoted to Past-Presidents' Get-together Talklets, at which these ex-officios related their experiences and linked the history of the lodge's progress in this entertaining manner. The following meeting was devoted to a debate "Is Judaism a Creed or Race?" capably presented by Brothers Leonard Freiberg and Jacob Herman for "Race" and Brothers Rabbi Mielziner and David Spritz for "Creed." The debate resulted in a decision in favor of "Creed" handed in by Judges Victor Abraham, Hon. B. S. Oppenheimer and Harry J. Levi. The hall was practically filled with enthused members.

At the last meeting, April 12, a class of 26 candidates was produced for initiation. The ceremony was beautiful and most impressive, the ritual being adequately exemplified in a very touching manner by Brothers Harry J. Levi, Victor Abraham, Milton Hurtig and Dr. Mielziner. Congratulations were forthcoming from all sides on the beautiful work of this team.

Chairman Alfred E. Reinauer, of the married men's committee and A. Edgar Aub of the single men's committee assured the lodge of some very satisfactory results in the near future. Brother A. Edgar Aub introduced the idea of a five-day "whirlwind" membership campaign, which after being outlined to the members, was heartily endorsed and Mr. Aub appointed chairman of this committee. A follow-up advertising campaign to a selected mailing list and personal solicitation by an army of volunteer workers was outlined to bring several hundred representative men into the order.

Chairman Joseph H. Levi of the Entertainment Committee announced the acceptance by Governor Moses Alexander of Idaho of an invitation extended to him to address the Lodge some time in the near future. Chairman Levi is planning a rally and get-together banquet in honor of the Governor, who is a Jew and a prominent Ben B'rith, and invitations to prominent men to address the Lodge and its guests will be sent out shortly.

NEW B'NAI B'RITH LODGE TO BE INSTITUTED AT KITTANNING, PA.

Arrangements for the institution of Unity Lodge No. 770 of Kittanning, Pa., was made on Sunday afternoon, May 9, 1915, at the Synagogue. Every available place was occupied with members of the Jewish community. The meeting was called to order by the president of the congregation, Mr. J. L. Apple, who welcomed the gathering and introduced Mr. Mark Alexander of Pittsburgh, a member of the General Committee of District Grand Lodge No. 3. Brother Alexander spoke upon the aims and objects of the Order. He was followed by Brother M. Wiesenthal, secretary of Abraham Lippman Lodge of Pittsburgh. Brother Edw. Hemple of Pittsburgh, a member of the Board of the Erie Orphanage, dwelt upon the noble work performed by the institution, emphasizing the fact that the Orphanage is maintained in strict accordance with Jewish dietary laws.

At the conclusion of the addresses a resolution was immediately passed that the Jewry of Kittanning and Ford City organize and form a lodge of the Order. The petition for a charter for the new lodge was signed by 34 prominent co-religionists and it was resolved to have the institution of the lodge held on Sunday, June 6.

REFUGEES HAVE TO LEAVE HUNGARY.

The refugees from Galicia and Bukowina who fled to Hungary are not permitted by the Hungarian government to remain in that country, for the strange reason that as they are Austrian subjects they should stay in Austria.

MONSTER CLASS INITIATION AND BANQUET.

Cincinnati Lodge No. 4, I. O. B. B. is fast becoming one of the most progressive and enthusiastic lodges of the Order. A seven-day whirlwind Membership Campaign, which terminated the early part of May, resulted in the enlistment of 426 representative Jewish citizens who applied for enrollment upon the roster of that lodge. The phenomenal success of this campaign was directly due to Chairman of the Membership Committee A. Edgar Aub, and his associate workers, Manny Straus and Irvin Mihalovitch, who, with the magnificent assistance of the Captains of eight appointed teams, achieved this gratifying and wonderful result. As a fitting termination of this important event, it was decided to place the matter in charge of Joseph H. Levi, Chairman of the Entertainment Committee of the Lodge, who arranged for a magnificent banquet and initiatory service, which was given at the Sinton Hotel, May 17, and to which the 426 candidates were invited as guests of the lodge. The attendance at the affair reached over 500, of which 276 were candidates who presented themselves for initiation. The Cincinnati Lodge now numbers over one thousand, the largest in the United States, with 150 more candidates awaiting admission. Chairman Levi, ably assisted by his committee, Sidney L. Rosin and Benj. Friedman, succeeded in producing the most widely discussed event ever given by the Order in this locality. Prominent officials of the Order graced the affair with their presence. Harry H. Friedman, President of the Lodge presided; Rabbi Joseph S. Kornfeld, of Columbus, Ohio, President of District No. 2, and Mayor Frederick S. Spiegel, were guests of honor. Rabbi David Phillipson invoked the blessing preceding the banquet and Rabbi Louis Grossman offered the benediction. Mayor Spiegel spoke eloquently, stating with pride that he was addressing the Order as a brother, not a city official, and that he has been identified with the Lodge for the past 37 years. He remarked that the Lodge's activities would be greatly enlarged after the war, and that the younger element would find much constructive work to do. The initiation which followed the dinner, and was interspersed with music, was rendered in an excellent manner by the degree team, Brothers Alfred M. Cohen, Victor Abraham, Rabbi Jacob Mielziner and Milton Hurtig officiating. The evening closed with a stirring address by Rabbi Joseph S. Kornfeld, in which he outlined the needs of the Order and its importance to the community, an adequate finish to an affair which will redound to the everlasting credit of the Cincinnati Jewry.

MORITZ LAZARUS LODGE NO. 635, GOETTINGEN.

When the war broke out the Lodge appropriated 1,000 marks for aid purposes in the city of Goettingen. It gave 300 marks for the hospital train of the District Grand Lodge and it also collected 200 marks from brethren for the same train. It also donated 50 marks for the benefit of Jewish teachers in East Prussia who lost their positions during the Russian invasion.

On the second night of Chanukkah the Lodge arranged a festival for the Jewish soldiers who were at that time in Goettingen. The brethren and sisters of the Lodge attended this festival in great numbers and helped to make the ceremonies impressive. The soldiers were served with refreshments and were given presents. Gifts were also sent to all members of the Lodge and their relatives at the front and to all the soldiers of the local Jewish community.

EXTRACT OF PROCEEDINGS OF MEETING OF GENERAL COMMITTEE OF DISTRICT NO. 8, GERMANY.

At the meeting of the General Committee of the District Grand Lodge, held in Berlin on March 4, Brother Grand President Timendorfer announced the death of Brother Ex-President Isidor Dreyfuss of Frankfort-on-the-Main.

Brother Dr. James Simon stated that he has learned from reliable sources that in the Polish districts occupied by the German troops, especially in Mlawa, great want and sickness prevail. A Jewish hospital was established there by the military administration and Brother Simon requested the Grand Lodge to supply the necessary linen. Upon the recommendation of Brother Timendorfer the request of Brother Simon was granted.

Brother Kuznitzky reported concerning a highly satisfactory general meeting of the Society for Procuring Employment, which was recently held in Berlin.

BORUSSIA LODGE NO. 491, DANZIG.

Immediately after the breaking out of the war the Lodge appointed a war committee which was empowered to attend to all activities of the Lodge for the benefit of the fatherland.

For such purposes the Lodge appropriated 1,000 marks, 300 of which were given to the Red Cross, 100 to the National Fund for the Families of Soldiers Killed in the War, 100 to the Danzig Fund in Aid of the War Sufferers. In addition to the 1,000 marks donated by Borussia Lodge, the President of the Lodge collected about 8,000 marks in B'nai B'rith circles for the same purpose.

The building of the Recreation Home for Children at Zappot with thirty beds, owned by the United Lodges of North Germany, were placed at the disposal of the authorities, for hospital purposes.

The Lodge rooms were tendered to the Magistracy of Danzig and were used by the same, first for the National Women's Service and then for the Family Relief of the Danzig War Aid Commission.

The Sisters' Society of Borussia Lodge expended 300 marks for the benefit of the fatherland and it also contributed liberally to a collection of gifts for soldiers undertaken by Borussia Lodge.

The Girls' Club of the Lodge arranged knitting evenings and the finished articles were presented to soldiers. This club has also collected many other gifts for the soldiers.

The activity of the Children's Retreat of the Lodge has earned special thanks and was much praised in public. Immediately after the war broke out, this institution took in eighty non-Jewish children and today 146 children receive there a warm meal every evening at the expense of the Lodge.

In consequence of the geographical location of Danzig, the Lodge was made to feel deeply the great distress of the population of East Prussia, as well as the sad position of the expelled Russian co-religionists. Although private parties were largely interested in the aid of the East Prussian refugees, the Lodge gave shelter to a brother and his family and to several other families in the Zappot Home.

The Lodge contributed 300 marks to the collection for the benefit of Russian Jews who were expelled from Danzig.

One thousand marks was contributed by the Lodge to a loan-fund which was established for the purpose of furnishing means for the continuance of their vocations to those who were deprived of the chance of earning a livelihood.

Brethren and sisters of Borussia Lodge and their relatives offered their services to the Lodge and were ready to do all kinds of work, such as watchmen in the Citizens Protection, office work, harvest labor and depot service for the benefit of the fatherland.

A collection of good books was sent by the Lodge to the hospitals, for the benefit of Jewish soldiers.

An elevating Chanukkah festival was arranged in the lodge rooms for Jewish soldiers. The festival was well attended and the soldiers received gifts and refreshments.

JOINT MEETING OF MONTGOMERY LODGES.

A most successful joint meeting of Emanuel Lodge No. 103 and Alabama Lodge No. 299, both of Montgomery, Ala., was held on Sunday, April 25, 1915. It was an enthusiastic meeting and its success was due largely to the efforts of the Propaganda Committee. There were many interesting and timely addresses, and what is more important, promises of greater activity from many hitherto indifferent members.

An article by Rev. Dr. J. Leonard Levy in the B'nai B'rith News entitled "The B'nai B'rith's Opportunity" was reviewed and aroused much comment and interest.

B'NAI B'RITH FURTHERS WORK OF HEBREW SHELTERING AND IMMIGRANT AID SOCIETY.

To aid Jewish immigrants coming into San Francisco, an organization was effected at a recent meeting called by Brother Harry K. Wolff, of San Francisco, President of District Grand Lodge No. 4, and attended by prominent members of the Order in that city and other leading Jews. Brother Wolff was elected chairman and Brother I. J. Aschheim, the Secretary of the District Grand Lodge, was made secretary.

The local society will extend help to the immigrant in every possible way. He will be assisted in securing employment and given whatever other help and advice he may require. A committee on ways and means was appointed.

ACTIVITIES OF SIEGMUND BERGEL LODGE NO. 692, OF RUSTSCHUK, BULGARIA.

In the year 1913 the Lodge created an auxiliary society under the name of "Beth Yacob." This auxiliary is doing excellent work in the fields of benevolence and social service. It attends to visiting the sick, caring for the poor and arranges social affairs jointly with the Lodge. It has a capital of 1,500 francs and its prospects for the future are very bright and promising.

During the Balkan war the Lodge took the initiative in the relief work for the war sufferers. A translation of the constitution of the Order into Judea-Spanish was made by the Lodge for District Grand Lodge No. 11, and the Lodge is advancing the sale of a book on the history of the Jews of Rustschuk, written by Brother Solomon A. Rosanis in the Judeo-Spanish language.

The Lodge has three foundations under its management, the Locality Foundation with about 3,500 francs; Menahemoff Foundation with about 1,200 francs, and the Rebecca Samuel Arditti Foundation with 1,400 francs. The first provides the means for the construction of a Lodge building within the next 10 to 15 years. The second has been created in commemoration of the captivity in Greece of Brother Dr. Menahemoff, ex-president of the Lodge. The interest of this fund is to be employed for the benefit of any co-religionists falling into captivity in the future. The third fund was formed in memory of Rebecca, wife of Brother Samuel El Arditti. It has not yet been decided for what purpose this fund is to be used.

The Lodge subsidizes four students, two of whom are studying abroad.

The "Hessed We-emeth" Society of Rustschuk, which has been in existence for sixty years and has an annual income of 5,000 francs, has transferred all its assets to the Lodge, as it has lost all but two of its members by death. The Lodge has appointed a special committee to administer independently the affairs of the society, the main activities of which consist of distributing coal and other aid to the poor.

The Lodge has started a library with 2,600 volumes donated by Brother Balin, and is trying to build up a model library for the benefit of the entire Jewish community of Rustschuk. The Lodge is also working hard to bring about the establishment of Jewish schools for girls in Bulgaria.

Through the energetic intervention of the Lodge a quarrel of long standing between brethren of Philippopolis and brethren of Slivno was settled by arbitration.

GOOD WORK.

While in New Britain, Conn., Secretary Bernard M. Kaplan, of District No. 1 interviewed Father Rev. L. Bojnowski, Editor of the Catholic Leader and head of the Polish Church in New Britain, Conn., who is reported to have shown a most hostile attitude towards the Jewish people in New Britain. He was even reported to have advised his parishioners not to patronize Jewish stores, very much after the manner of the Polish boycott in Warsaw. Bro. Dr. Kaplan was received most cordially by the Priest and the impression prevails in New Britain that Secretary Kaplan succeeded in making Father Bojnowski adopt a more friendly attitude towards the Jewish citizens of that city. Bro. Kaplan pointed out to Father Bojnowski that a hostile attitude towards any portion of the American citizenship or towards any race or class of people under the American flag was not only un-American but most un-Christian, so that even from the point of view of Christianity, any anti-semitic agitation is a reflection on Him, whose teachings Christians are supposed to follow. Secretary Kaplan also called Father Bojnowski's attention to the fact that the Jews and Poles have been fellow sufferers throughout the history of the world and ought to sympathize with one another rather than oppose one another. Bro. Kaplan made a deep impression upon the Priest. The Jews of New Britain are grateful to the General Committee for Secretary Kaplan's visit.

Bro. Fred Winkle, who is an active member of the lodge, and a city officer, took Father Bojnowski to task on some previous occasion. It is sincerely hoped that the Jews of New Britain who represent a very respected portion of the citizens, will not be further annoyed by such utterances as were attributed to the head of the leading Catholic Church in New Britain.

What Our Lodges Are Doing

GOLDEN ANNIVERSARY OF EMEK BERACHA LODGE NO. 61.

Emek Beracha Lodge No. 61, of Fort Wayne, Ind., celebrated on May 2, 1915, the fiftieth or golden anniversary of its existence. Rabbi Meyer Lovitch, the President of the Lodge, being absent from the city, Brother Louis Plost, the Vice-President, invited Past President Brother Marx Frank, one of the two surviving character members of the lodge, to preside at the jubilee meeting.

After the regular routine of business, during which three new members were elected and one brother reinstated, the members present enjoyed a smoker. Much enthusiasm prevailed and a number of the older members made speeches filled with reminiscences of the good work done in the past and promising even more devotion for the future.

Instead of giving a banquet or spending money otherwise, the lodge decided to make an additional donation of Fifty Dollars for the benefit of our poor coreligionists, sufferers on account of the war in Europe.

JOINT MEETING OF NEW YORK LODGES.

Washington Lodge No. 19, Jordan Lodge No. 15, and Hebron Lodge No. 5 held a most successful joint meeting on April 15, 1915. Brother Rev. Lipkind, of Washington Lodge, read a delightful paper on "Jewish Wit and Humor." Brother Herman Asher, President of the District, delivered an eloquent address upon the affairs of the Order. Other speakers who addressed this very interesting meeting were Bro. Bernard M. Kaplan, Secretary of the District; Bro. Maurice P. Davidson, Chairman Committee on Laws; Bro. I. Irving Lipsitch, member of the General Committee; President Bartow of Hebron Lodge, President Reiss of Lebanon Lodge, Henry Blank of N. Y. Isaiah Lodge, M. S. Weeker of Washington Lodge, Bro. Dr. Eiseman and Bro. P. Davidson. Fifteen candidates were initiated by the Degree Team of Jordan Lodge, one of the best Degree Teams in the District.

ARGO LODGE, WASHINGTON, D. C.

The meeting of Argo Lodge No. 413, of Washington, D. C., held on Sunday, April 25, 1915, at the Temple, was a history maker. More than 250 members were present and all agreed that it was the greatest meeting in the history of the lodge. A large class of candidates was initiated by the degree team in charge of Brother Rabbi Abram Simon. Many talks for the good and welfare of the lodge were indulged in and at the conclusion of the meeting refreshments were served.

At a recent meeting of the lodge Brother A. Brand, who is one of its hardest workers, and has secured many new members, was presented with a gold medal in recognition of his services.

RAMAH LODGE, CHICAGO.

A general meeting of Ramah Lodge No. 33 was held at its lodge rooms on Thursday evening, June 10, 1915. Prior to the meeting the members assembled at Weiss' Restaurant, where a complimentary dinner was tendered by the lodge. At its conclusion all repaired to the lodge rooms where a rousing meeting was held. The meeting was principally intended as a testimonial to the delegates of the lodge who returned recently from the Convention of the Order in San Francisco.

After routine business, which included initiation of a class of candidates and the election of officers, addresses were delivered by the delegates, Brothers Philip Stein, Edward Sonnenschein and A. B. Seelenfreund, all dwelling upon the accomplishments of the recent convention.

At the conclusion of the meeting the members remained for some time indulging in a social chat.

MINNEAPOLIS LODGE.

The meeting of Minneapolis Lodge No. 27[illegible] of Minneapolis, Minn., held on May [illegible]7, 1915, was unusually well attended. The special feature of the meeting was the presence of Brother Dr. Samuel Wolfenstein, Superintendent of the B'nai Brith Orphan Asylum in Cleveland, who addressed the lodge.

At the April meeting of the lodge Prof. [illegible] of the German department of the University of Minnesota [illegible] an interesting lecture on "Germany and the War."

SISTERS' UNION OF ZION LODGE, HANOVER.

At the outbreak of the war the Sisters placed their services at the disposal of the National Women's Service and a number of them were soon working at the depot to refresh the passing Hanover soldiers and in the asylum for refugees. Some of the Sisters have been working since the beginning of the war in the city hall, in the bureau of the National Women's Service and a greater number is engaged in the difficult work of gaining information about families that have become in need of aid on account of the war.

Besides this work, some of the Sisters are doing duty in the center for Jewish Welfare, which includes the care of families and of interned refugees.

KANSAS CITY, MO.

On Thursday evening, April 22, the "Cultural Committee" of Kansas City Lodge No. 184 provided the membership with one of the finest programmes it has been their pleasure to enjoy. The entertainment consisted of a discussion by Brothers Rabbi Harry H. Mayer, Julius Davidson, Dr. H. D. Jerowitz, David Bachrach and Alvin E. Block, on the subject: "Is there prejudice in Kansas City against the Jews, and if so what can we do to prevent it?" To say that the subject was well handled is putting it very mildly. All members who failed to hear these speakers missed a valuable opportunity of being informed on a subject of vital importance to all. The meeting was well attended, there being about 100 members present.

The meeting adjourned to a buffet luncheon served in the Vestry rooms of the Temple.

It is the object of Dr. Samuel Lobenstein, Chairman of the Cultural Committee and the Vice-President, Herman Stern, Chairman of the Propaganda Committee, to make these Clutural meetings redound to the benefit of the order by spreading Propaganda work, and results prove their idea correct, the lodge having initiated about 35 members since the first of the year.

The lodge does not confine its efforts entirely to the advancement of its own welfare. On Sunday, May 9, one of its degree teams conferred the initiatory work on nine candidates for Beth Horon Lodge No. 599, of Kansas City, Kan., whose meeting was well attended. Refreshments were served after the meeting. Beth Horon Lodge has a bright future before it, as the lodge has an enthusiastic membership.

MEMORIAL SERVICES BY ST. LOUIS B'NAI B'RITH LODGES.

Memorial services under the auspices of Missouri and Ebn Ezra Lodges of St. Louis, were held on the evening of April 25 at the United Hebrew Congregation. Several hundred members and their friends were present. Brother Jacob Furth, Treasurer of the Order, acted as chairman.

The invocation was given by Dr. Samuel Sale. Following was the order of exercises:

STEVENS POINT, WIS.

Menorah Lodge No. 769, of Stevens Point, Wis., held a special meeting on May 2, 1915, in the Synagogue for the special purpose of initiating a large class of candidates. Brothers A. F. Mecklenberger and Henry M. Seligman, of Chicago, members of the General Committee of the District Grand Lodge, were specially delegated to pay an official visit to the lodge on the occasion. They performed the initiatory work on the candidates and delivered addresses on the work of the Order. The visitors were entertained by the local members and all agreed that the meeting was a success.

INSTITUTION OF B'NAI B'RITH LODGE AT ORANGE, TEXAS.

Due to the activity of Brother Sol Schoenmann of Houston, Texas, ably assisted by Brother Leon R. Levy of Beaumont and Sigmund Westheim of Houston, Aaron Miller Lodge was instituted at Orange, Texas, on April 29, 1915, Brother Schoenmann acting on behalf of the District Grand Lodge. The lodge was organized with a charter membership of 25, all showing eagerness and enthusiasm to make the lodge a success.

TACOMA, WASH.

The last social evening of Tacomah Lodge was a "Ladies' Night," held on April 29, and a pleasing surprise to the hundred or more that were present. The hall was beautifully decorated for the occasion. Brother Monitor Feist presided and in an appropriate speech welcomed the guests.

Discussion was had at the meeting as to the advisability of organizing a ladies' auxiliary. The matter met with unanimous approval and in the near future the lodge hopes to organize such an auxiliary.

A pleasing musical program was rendered and the remainder of the evening was devoted to card games, after which refreshments were served.

EL PASO, TEXAS.

B'nai B'rith Day was fittingly celebrated by El Paso Lodge No. 509, of El Paso, Texas, on the evening of April 27, 1915. The Temple, where the meeting was held, was taxed to its capacity. The program included welcoming remarks by Rabbi Martin Zielonka, a prayer by Rabbi L. J. Rothstein of Alexandria, La., addresses by Brothers H. A. Forchheimer of Mobile, Rabbi Henry Cohen of Galveston, and Leon Schwarz of Mobile. Musical and vocal numbers interspersed the program and the closing prayer was delivered by Rabbi A. B. Rhine of Hot Springs.

The visiting officers were en route to San Francisco to attend the convention of the Order. In their addresses they traced the history of the Order since its inception, and dwelt upon its work and its significance.

Special attention was called to the fact that the Order is accomplishing practical philanthropic work not only for the Jewish people but for humanity.

The visiting officers were entertained with luncheon at the Hotel Sheldon at noon, in special honor of one of the visitors, Brother Dr. Henry Cohen of Galveston.

ANNIVERSARY CELEBRATION BY McKEESPORT LODGE.

McKeesport Lodge No. 573 celebrated its eleventh anniversary by an entertainment and musical at the Altmeyer Theater on Tuesday evening, May 18th. The auditorium was beautifully decorated with flags and flowers. On this stage sat all the ex-presidents of the lodge, together with Brother Eugene Krow the present president of McKeesport Lodge.

Brother Krow opened the exercises with a short address in which he told of the good work accomplished by the lodge, mentioning that it has furnished an entire cottage in the Erie orphanage.

The principal speaker of the evening was Brother Leonard S. Levin, of Pittsburgh, who spoke on "The Jew as a Patriot." He started with the historical protest of 1765 against the actions of Great Britain towards the Colonies, which have the signatures of nine Jews in Philadelphia, and he touched upon the different periods of the development of the United States to show that the Jew has always been a true and loyal patriot. Other features on the program were vocal solos and a reading. The excellent music rendered by a full orchestra contributed very much to the complete success of the celebration.

VANCOUVER, B. C.

Samuel Lodge No. 668, of Vancouver, B. C., gave its third conjoint meeting on the evening of April 21, which surpassed all the previous social meetings. It consisted of a debate by four members and a playlet given by the dramatic section of the Samuel Auxiliary. The subject of the debate was "Monarchy." The humorous playlet, "Six Cups of Chocolate," was given most creditably and was under the direction of Miss Goldblum. Musical numbers interspersed the program.

NEW ORLEANS, LA.

A meeting of the Joint Committee of the New Orleans lodges was held on Monday, May 24, at the Y. M. H. A. Building. The condition of the Jews in the European war zone was considered, and it was decided to continue soliciting donations to the relief fund.

Another matter discussed was the subject of consolidation of lodges. A circular letter will be sent to the members of the Order in New Orleans requesting an expression of views on the subject.

The question of securing a more suitable lodge room for the use of the lodges, and plans for the establishment of a B'nai B'rith home were also considered.

The most important matter under consideration was the proposition to arrange a reception in honor of Brother Archibald A. Marx, elected Second Vice-President of the Order at the recent convention in San Francisco.

It was resolved to arrange for a joint meeting of the local lodges on June 8, on which occasion it is hoped that every member will attend.

A campaign for membership has been inaugurated and the creation of two degree teams has been ordered.

ZION LODGE NO. 360, HANOVER.

The Lodge contributed 9,050 marks for the benefit of the fatherland: 1,000 marks were given to the Red Cross, 500 marks to the National Women's Service, 500 marks to the Welfare of the Jewish Congregation, 500 marks for the care of families in the city of Hanover, 5,000 marks to the Hospital Train, 50 marks to the Sisters Union to purchase wool for knitting, 700 marks to Dr. Strauss' Hospital which was founded by voluntary gifts from a number of brethren, and 800 marks for gifts sent by the Sisters' Union to the Jewish soldiers.

RESOLUTIONS.

Whereas, Another link has been broken in the chain of our fraternal circle; a worthy member has been removed from our earthly Lodge below where a mortal presides, to the Grand Lodge above, where the Grand Master of the Universe presides, and

Whereas, In the death of our late brother, Charles Jacobs, which occurred on April 24, 1915, Palestine Lodge No. 526, I. O. B. B., feels keenly the loss we have sustained, and in order to give utterance to that sentiment of sympathy and respect that comes from the heart of all brothers, B'nai B'rith, whose aims and objects are to be a blessing to mankind, be it, therefore,

Resolved, That our departed brother was in reality a good and true Ben Brith, whose work and whose life was indeed a blessing to all among whom he lived and moved. He was a sweet blessing to his loving family, for whom we offer our earnest prayers, that Heavenly condolence may cast its rays of peace and comfort into their troubled hearts, and that by emulating the life and conduct of the dear departed, they may also become a blessing; be it further

Resolved, That our profound sympathy be extended to the fond wife and dear children in their sad bereavement and with them ever cherish the memory of our departed brother, and be it further

Resolved, That these resolutions be spread upon the Minutes of our Lodge, published in our daily papers and the B'nai B'rith News, and a copy be sent to the family.

Julius H. Pearlstone,
Hyman Harrison,
Joe Chotiner,
Committee.

CINCINNATI, OHIO.

The meeting of Cincinnati Lodge No. 4, of Cincinnati, held on April 12, was one of the most interesting for many years. The attendance was so large that the seating facilities were inadequate. The meeting was honored by the presence of a large number of the "Old Guard," among them Wm. Ornstein, Moses Schwab and Victor Abraham. The degree team exemplified the ritual on a class of candidates. The special feature of the meeting was the organization of a whirlwind campaign for new candidates and committees were appointed for this purpose.

At the close of the meeting a social hour was spent, during which some timely remarks were made.

DISTRICT NO. 1.

District No. 1 mourns the demise of Brother William A. Gans, Past-President of the District. The late Bro. Gans was active in B'nai B'rith matters for a number of years and was President of the Maimonides Library until it became a branch of the New York Public Library. He was a graduate of the New York University Law School and had an extensive practice. He was very much loved by all classes of people.

The District also mourns the death of the late Brother Jacob Cane, Past-President of the Home at Yonkers, and for nearly twenty-five years a member of the Board of Governors. He was a man of a very lovable disposition, genial and generous, a loyal Ben Brith and a devoted Jew.

Edward Everett Lodge No. 97 presented a beautiful testimonial to its beloved Past-President, Louis Kempner, for his faithful services. The presentation address was made by Bro. Wm. B. Ast, Bro. Julius Levy presiding. There was a large gathering present and a special talk on the Ideals of the Order was given by Bro. Bernard M. Kaplan, Secretary of the District.

New York-Isaiah Lodge No. 1 had a very interesting initiation. The meeting was attended by a large number of brothers from different lodges. The meeting was addressed by Brothers Wm. Goldschmidt, Secretary Kaplan of the District, P. Davidson, Alfred Weil, Wm. Asher, Samuel M. Roeder, Henry Gutenstein, Sanford J. Friedlander, President Edwin H. Levy and Bro. M. Victorius of the New York Isaiah Lodge. The following beautiful line appeared in the invitation to the initiation: "The seven candles of the Menorah will burn on the night of April 14."

The delegates to the Constitution Grand Lodge that met in San Francisco are very enthusiastic about the Convention, which they consider one of the most interesting Conventions in the history of the Order. They speak very highly of the hospitable manner in which they were entertained by the brothers of the Order in California and all through the West.

There has been unusual activity lately all through District No. 1. There have been many initiations, large and enthusiastic meetings and a general spirit of good fellowship and co-operation. President Brother Herman Asher brought into the Order Justice Benjamin N. Cardoza of the Court of Appeals of the State of New York. The coming into the Order of Justice Benjamin N. Cardoza is considered a great acquisition to the District and the Order generally.

Jordan Lodge Degree Team has had the honor of initiating candidates during the month of April in the following lodges: New York Isaiah No. 1, Hebron No. 5, Jordan No. 15, Washington No. 19 and Mishael No. 166. The candidates will long remember the impressive ceremony.

Henry Jones Lodge No. 79, through the activity of its much beloved President, Abraham Anhalt, and Bro. Joseph Levenson, Chairman of the Intellectual Advancement Committee of the District, has lately gained a considerable number of new members who are very enthusiastic about the lodge bearing the name of the founder of the Order.

Brothers President Herman Asher, Secretary Bernard M. Kaplan, Dr. M. M. Stark, Joseph Levenson, Chairman of the Intellectual Advancement Committee, and Joseph Morje have been visiting some of the older lodges, stirring them up to renewed activities.

Washington Lodge No. 19, through its active and enthusiastic President, Bro. Dr. M. M. Stark, held last week a very interesting meeting at which some current topics were discussed. Past-President Rev. Dr. Joseph Silverman was the principal speaker.

Washington Lodge No. 19 and Maccabee Lodge No. 71 held a joint meeting at which new members were initiated by the Maccabee Lodge Degree Team. The lecturer of the evening was Bro. Dr. George Kohut.

Akiba Lodge No. 173 was addressed by its Past-President, Bro. Louis Lorence, who spoke on the "War and Its Effect on Jewry."

Henry Jones Lodge No. 79, of which Bro. Abr. Anhalt is President, gave a delightful dance for the entertainment of the younger members and their friends.

The Home at Yonkers has been visited by Jordan and Washington Lodges.

The members were entertained by interesting programs under the general supervision of Bro. Henry Meyers, Chairman of the Entertainment Committee of the Home.

Through the efforts of Bro. Henry Meyers and Bro. Mo. Minzesheimer, both of whom are Governors of the Home at Yonkers, the Home received some valuable contributions.

Mrs. Caroline Schattman sent a check for $200 to the Home "in sincere appreciation of the kind and courteous treatment accorded to an aged relative at the Home in Yonkers."

Mrs. Caroline Latz entertained the members of the Home in memory of her late husband, Solomon Latz, who was one of the Governors of the Home.

Secretary Bernard M. Kaplan visited and addressed the following out-of-town lodges during the month: Harmony No. 711 at Bridgeport, Conn.; Adullam No. 326 at Pittsfield, Mass., and Jehuda Halevi No. 710 at New Britain, Conn.

Harmony No. 711 at Bridgeport, Conn., is one of the most active lodges in the District. President Bro. Maximilian Stein, Bro. Charles H. Shapiro, Bro. Sigmund Loewith and Bro. Joseph G. Shapiro are devoting considerable time and effort to B'nai B'rith matters.

In Pittsfield, Mass., District Deputy Bro. Leo. Zander, Secretary James M. Rosenthal and Past-President Simon Rosenthal are co-operating with the President of the Lodge in an effort to increase the membership and to provide intellectual programs for the meetings.

Jehuda Halevi Lodge No. 710 at New Britain, Conn., is unusually well attended, thanks to the efforts of its President, Morris D. Saxe, the Chairman of the Entertainment Committee, M. M. Miller, and Past-President, B. Miller. The Lodge is the center of most of the Jewish activities in New Britain, Conn.

Amos Lodge No. 121, of Boston, Mass., is fortunate in having very active and enthusiastic officers who seek to make the Lodge the center of Jewish culture in Boston.

Among the earnest and enthusiastic workers in Maccabee Lodge No. 71 is Brother William Klapp, who has recently brought in the following new members, all of whom are prominent attorneys in the city: Julius D. Tobias, Joseph S. Klein, Maurice J. Dix, Irving Goldberg, Bernard S. Deutsch and William Bernfeld.

Rev. Dr. Bernard M. Kaplan, of New York, Secretary of District Grand Lodge No. 1, delivered a lecture at Bridgeport, Conn., under the auspices of Harmony Lodge No. 711, on April 18, on the subject, "The Unity of Israel."

Henry Jones Lodge No. 79 of New York City gave a dance on Saturday evening, May 1, 1915, at the Hotel Bon Ray, which was largely attended.

Manhattan Lodge No. 156 of New York City entertained the members of the Old People's Home at Yonkers on Sunday, May 23. Washington Lodge No. 19 of New York did likewise on Sunday, May 30.

Flatbush Lodge No. 753 of Flatbush, Long Island, gave a successful social evening on April 7, which was largely attended.

DISTRICT NO. 2.

Oriental-Hillel Lodge No. 72 of Chicago, gave a "welcome home" meeting to its distinguished member, Brother Adolf Kraus, President of the Order, on Thursday evening, May 27, 1915. A large attendance greeted President Kraus upon his entry into the lodge rooms and welcoming addresses were made by Brothers Julius H. Meyer and Dr. H. I. Davis on behalf of Oriental-Hillel Lodge; Julian J. Gutfeld on behalf of Ramah Lodge, and Benj. Samuels on behalf of David Fish Lodge. Brother Kraus responded in a happy vein and in his remarks gave a short review of the accomplishments of the recent convention of the Order.

Brother Ben Blumenthal of Duluth, Minn., an ardent worker of Covenant Lodge No. 569 of that city, was honored at the recent election held in that city by being elected one of the City Commissioners by a majority of over 2000 votes.

A special [illegible] meeting of Gilead and [illegible] Lodges of Milwaukee, under the auspices of the local Central B'nai B'rith Council was held on June 3, 1915, at the Hotel Wisconsin. A large class of candidates was initiated by the degree team representing both lodges and the meeting, which was well attended, was presided over by Brother Chas. L. Aaron, the President of the District.

DISTRICT NO 7.

Moses Lodge No. 257 of Marshall, Texas, lost one of its prominent workers in the death of Brother Z. M. Bergson, treasurer of the lodge. Brother Bergson was an ardent adherent to Judaism and a [illegible] loyal Ben B'rith.

A [illegible] meeting of the B'nai B'rith [illegible] of Houston, Texas, was held at the Jewish Literary Hall on the evening of April 19. The delegates to the recent Grand Lodge convention made their reports. An address was delivered by Brother Sol Schoenmann, who was elected Third Vice-President of the District.

Forth Smith Lodge No. 306 of Fort Smith, Ark., lost one of its most valued members in the death of Brother Moses Winter, who passed to his eternal rest on March 17. The funeral was held under the auspices of the lodge.

Herzl Lodge No. 608, of Houston, Texas, held a largely attended meeting on April 7. After routine business, short talks were made by the delegates who attended the recent convention of the District Grand Lodge.

The regular meeting of Memphis Lodge No. 35, of Memphis, Tenn., held on April 25, was made interesting by the report of Brother H. Henochsberg, delegate to the recent convention of the District Grand Lodge.

At a meeting of Memphis Lodge No. 35, held on May 9, Brother Chas. J. Haase gave an account of the Quinquennial Convention of the Constitution Grand Lodge recently held in San Francisco.

On the evening of May 12, at its lodge rooms, Dallas Lodge No. 187 of Dallas, Texas, gave its third Intellectual Meeting of the year. Mr. Myron B. Kesner, the city playgrounds expert, was the principal speaker of the evening. Vocal selections and musical numbers were part of the program and at the conclusion refreshments were served.

Under the auspices of Muskogee Lodge No. 628, of Muskogee, Okla., a public meeting was called on April 11, 1915, which was attended by a large number of co-religionists of the community, and resulted in the organization of the Oklahoma Jewish War Relief Association. The object of this new organization is to enroll all members of the Jewish faith in an effort to relieve, by monthly contributions, the distress caused by the war.

A benefit performance for the building fund for the Home for Aged and Infirm Jews was recently given at the American Theater, in Memphis, Tenn. This project was initiated about a year ago by Memphis Lodge of that city.

Brother Simon Bloom, of Pine Bluff, Ark., was appointed recently by Governor Hays a member of the new Board of Accountants. Brother Bloom is mayor of his home town. He is an active and influential worker in all matters pertaining to Judaism, an ardent member of the B'nai B'rith and of all charitable organizations.

Coosa Lodge No. 734, of Gadsden, Ala., held a well attended meeting on April 18, on which occasion Brother Nadler, delegate to the recent convention of the Grand Lodge, submitted his report. Initiation of candidates was also a feature of the meeting.

DISTRICT NO. 11.

Under the auspices of Siegmund Bergel Lodge No. 692, of Rustchuk, Bulgaria, a library and reading room was established for the use not only of its members but for the general Jewish public.

ARGO LODGE, WASHINGTON, D. C.

Argo Lodge entertained about 200 members and guests at a Ladies' Night at its April meeting. A select musical program followed by a social hour proved a highly enjoyable way of entertaining the Lodge. The talent was largely made up from daughters and wives of members, and the entire program was rendered by ladies. A feature of the evening was a brief address on Woman's Suffrage by a prominent suffragist of Washington.

A benefit performance at the Columbia Theater was held on May 24 by the regular theater company. A small fund of money was raised for the use of the Entertainment Committee in its work.

THE LADIES AUXILIARY OF MAIMONIDES LODGE OF NUERNBERG.

This organization has 70 members. It pays special attention to the two retreats for Jewish youths established by Maimonides Lodge. These retreats are regularly visited by a standing committee of the Auxiliary.

The Auxiliary has arranged evening entertainments for working girls. Once every three weeks about 70 working girls are entertained with a lecture on a scientific, literary or musical topic, after which they are served with refreshments. In addition, the Auxiliary maintains a place where the girls can obtain advice in all personal matters. The Auxiliary is also of great assistance to Maimonides Lodge in the arrangement of all its entertainments.

B'NAI B'RITH ACTIVITIES IN PORTLAND, ORE.

Portland Lodge No. 416 gave the second of a series of social evenings on April 15, 1915, at the B'nai B'rith Building. The affair was greatly enjoyed by a large number present. Card playing was indulged in and the evening was brought to a close with dancing.

Brother A. E. Miller, recently appointed a member of the Intellectual Advancement Committee of the District Grand Lodge, has arranged for a series of short lectures to be delivered before Theo. Herzl Lodge No. 314. The first of these lectures was given by Dr. N. Mosessohn on the subject, "The Jew Among the Nations," at a meeting held on April 27. The second lect ure was given by Rabbi Jonah B. Wise on "The Gospel Interpretation of the Old Testament," on May 25. The proposition to have these lectures has met with general approval and will no doubt form valuable educational features for the local B'nai B'rith.

Portland Lodge No. 416 entertained the members of the two local lodges on May 4, 1915. Dr. A. G. Bettman gave a talk on the "Microscope." Brother D. N. Mosessohn, recently elected Second Grand Vice-President of the District, was received officially and delivered a short address.

The Daughters of the Covenant, auxiliary to the B'nai B'rith lodges of Portland, gave a card party in the B'nai B'rith Building on the afternoon of May 4, with Mrs. N. Mosessohn as hostess. The proceeds are to be used for the "flowers for the sick fund" of the lodge.

Portland Lodge No. 416 gave its second invitational social and dance at the B'nai B'rith Building on April 20, which proved a great success.

MEETING OF WAUSAU LODGE AT ANTIGO, WIS.

One of the most important events in the Jewish community of Antigo for a long time was the meeting held on April 18 at the Elks Hall under the auspices of Wausau Lodge No. 670, of Wausau, Wis., and the initiation of a class of candidates into the lodge. The delegation from Wausau came in a special car fifty strong; there were also representatives from Rhinelander, Tigerton and other adjacent cities.

The occasion was specially honored by the presence of Brothers Albert F. Mecklenberger and Henry M. Seligman, of Chicago, members of the General Committee of District Grand Lodge No. 6, who were specially delegated to visit the lodge.

A regular business meeting was held in the morning, at which time the candidates were initiated by the visitors, who also delivered short addresses. In the afternoon a public meeting was held with Brother S. Winkelman, of Wausau, president of the lodge, in the chair. An excellent musical program was rendered and addresses were delivered by the visiting Grand Lodge officers. Among those who contributed to the success of the afternoon's meeting were Miss Thea Katz, Morton Schaefer, Miss Sadie Lipman, Harry Weisberg, Miss Anna Harris, Miss Ethel Hart and R. L. Gilbert, who entertained the audience with music, songs and readings.

In the evening a banquet was served, in which more than 100 participated. Musical and vocal numbers were again indulged in and toasts were responded to by the visiting Grand Lodge officers and members of the lodge.

Following the banquet dancing was in order until midnight.

The splendid success of the meeting was due in a large measure to the committee in charge consisting of Brothers Dr. N. Kahn, Sam Goldberg and H. S. Aberman.

INSTITUTION OF B'NAI B'RITH LODGE AT READING, PA.

On April 18, 1915, Reading Lodge No. 768, of Reading, Pa., was instituted with a charter membership of 50. The ceremonies were conducted by the President of the District, Brother Abr. Weil, of Philadelphia; Brother M. S. Meyerhoff, of Philadelphia, Treasurer of the Grand Lodge, Brothers Jos. W. Salus, of Atlantic City, and Isidor Sobel of Erie, Past President of the District Grand Lodge, and many other members of the General Committee and the Grand Lodge.

At the conclusion of the initiatory ceremonies and the election of officers and the formal institution of the lodge, addresses were delivered by all the visiting brethren and much enthusiasm was aroused.

In the evening a reception and dinner was served to the visiting officers, at which short talks were indulged in by many of the guests.

ANNIVERSARY CELEBRATION OF WORCESTER LODGE, OF WORCESTER, MASS.

Worcester Lodge No. 600 celebrated its Tenth Anniversary with an exemplification of the Ritual by the Degree Team of Springfield Lodge, which is considered one of the finest Teams in the District. The Team was accompanied by President Herman Adaskin and numerous other members and a delegation of ladies. Several candidates were initiated on the occasion. The following are the members of the Springfield Degree Team: Frank Robinovitz, Henry B. Goodman, Josiah Davidson, Rev. Dr. Samuel Price, S. Silbert, Dr. Myron Wessler, Walter Widlansky, Frank E. Ack, Selig Katz, Joseph Goodman, Albert White, William F. Katz, Harry Elkin, A. P. Aronson, Victor Radnar, P. L. Davidson, Louis Brams, Oscar Mikola, Edward Adaskin and Michael Sissizky. The initiation was followed by an elaborate banquet. First Vice-President Judge Abraham K. Cohen of Boston, graced the occasion by his presence and presented to the Worcester Lodge a Cherubim as the Membership Prize, which was voted to Worcester Lodge at the last Convention. The Degree Team Prize was awarded by Bro. Maurice P. Davidson of New York, Chairman of the Committee on Laws, who represented President Herman Asher. Messages of greeting were read from President Herman Asher, Henry Lasker and Secretary Bernard M. Kaplan of the District, who were unable to be present. Bro. M. L. Katz, President of the Lodge, presided over the banquet. Bro. Dr. Elias H. Pofcher read an interesting historical sketch of the lodge in the absence of Saul Elias, who was the first President. Other speakers on this interesting occasion were: President Henry D. Bellin of Haggai Lodge, Providence; Herman Adaskin, President of Springfield Lodge; P. L. Davidson, Vice-President of Springfield Lodge; Rabbi Samuel Price of Springfield Lodge; Frederick Robinovitz, Dr. Myron Wessler and Henry B. Goodman, officials of Springfield Lodge Degree Team. Incidental to the dinner the members were entertained with vocal selections by Miss Hazel L. Childs. Music was furnished by an orchestra under the direction of Wilfred Feiga.

B'NAI B'RITH WORK IN SEATTLE, WASH.

Under the auspices of Rainier Lodge No. 627, of Seattle, a constructive idea has been brought to fruition, namely, that of bringing representatives of the various Jewish organizations of Seattle together for the purpose of securing a better mutual understanding, a more hearty co-operation, and to do away with wasteful duplication.

During the month of April the lodge was presented with two addresses, "The Jew of New York," by Dr. Nathan Foster of the department of zoology of the University of Washington, and "What the Jew Owes to the United States," by Brother S. Schwabacher. Both talks were instructive and gave evidence of much research on the part of the speakers.

One of the most successful dances of the year was given by Hildesheimer Lodge No. 503, on the evening of May 2. The lodge was assisted by the entertainment committee of the Ladies Auxiliary.

The Ladies Auxiliary of Hildesheimer Lodge of Seattle held an interesting meeting on April 15, and decided to assume the name "Daughters of the Covenant, Ida Straus" in honor of the Titanic heroine. The meeting was largely attended and after the business session the members of Hildesheimer Lodge invited the ladies to a Dutch lunch.

BANQUET OF COVENANT LODGE.

Covenant Lodge No. 569, of Duluth, Minn., held its annual banquet and class initiation at the Commercial Club on June 3, 1915. A class of ten candidates was initiated by Dr. Isaac L. Rypins, of St. Paul, and Bernard Silberstein, Safety Commissioner of the City, assisting the local degree team. After the initiatory work Dr. Rypins delivered the address of the evening on "Character Building," in which he outlined the principles of the Order and explained the many symbols and features of the initiation. He was followed by Brother Dr. Morris Lefkowitz, Rabbi of Temple Emanuel, Duluth. During the course of the banquet addresses were delivered by various members of the lodge.

During his stay in the city Dr. Rypins was a guest of the lodge. In the afternoon he was taken for an automobile drive through the city.

Proceedings of Constitution Grand Lodge Convention

On the evening of April 20, 1915, the party of delegates, accompanied by their ladies and friends, numbering in all, 110 persons, left Chicago via a special train en route to San Francisco to attend the Tenth General Convention of the Order.

The itinerary of the trip was so arranged as to visit as many lodges of the Order as possible, and by the presence of the delegates stimulate propaganda work. The first stop was made on the morning of April 21, at Kansas City, Mo., where the delegation was met by a committee from Kansas City Lodge No. 184. The stay was only long enough to afford the delegates an opportunity to partake of breakfast, and before departure all the members of the party were presented with a token by the committee on behalf of Kansas City Lodge.

Las Vegas, N. M.

Continuing its journey, the party reached Las Vegas, N. M., at 7:00 A. M., April 22. Upon arrival, representatives of the Commercial Club, the Board of Trade, and of J. E. Rosenwald Lodge, the local B'nai B'rith lodge, welcomed the party and after breakfast a tour was made through the city with automobiles and surrounding country including the famous springs. Returning to the city the delegates were taken to the city hall, where formal addresses of welcome were delivered and subsequntly a tour of inspection of the public buildings and clubs were made.

Albuquerque, N. M.

From Las Vegas the party proceeded to Albuquerque, N. M., arriving there in the afternoon of the same day. A committee of Albuquerque Lodge took the party for an automobile ride through the city and surrounding country, visiting the Mexican quarter, inspecting collection of relics in the Hotel Alvarado, and viewing the Pueblos of the Rio Grand Valley. Returning, the entire party assembled at the building of the women's clubs, where an informal reception was held. Addresses of welcome were made by representatives of the lodge, to which a fitting response was made by President Kraus. Brief remarks upon the work of the Order were made by Brother Sig Livingston. At its conclusion refreshments were served and a social hour was spent. In the evening dinner was served at the Hotel Alvarado and the party left at 8:00 o'clock for the Grand Canon, arriving there on the morning of April 23. A full day was spent at this magnificent exhibition of nature and its forces. Excursions by various groups of the party were made by automobile and on foot to explore and view the Canon from various points.

Services Aboard Railroad Train.

An impressive Saturday morning service was observed on the train on April 24. at 10:00 o'clock in the morning, the entire party participating. Rabbi David Alexander of Toledo, O., read the services and the sermon was delivered by Dr. S. Wolfenstein of Cleveland. Brother Simon Wolf made a short address in which he expressed his belief in the growing American Judaism. The services were concluded with the singing of "En kelohenu" by the entire audience.

San Bernardino, Cal.

From the Grand Canon the party proceeded to San Bernardino, Cal., arriving there at noon on April 24. Here the party was met by a committee of Paradise Lodge and were given a sight-seeing trip through the city and at its conclusion lunch was served at one of the leading hotels.

Viewing Smiley Heights.

From San Bernardino the road led to Redlands, arriving there at 2:00 P. M. the same day. An excursion by automobile to Smiley Heights was the feature of this stop-over and the time spent in this beautiful town and the trip to the Smiley Heights will ever remain in the memory of those that took part in it.

A Ride Through the Orange Groves.

From Redlands was but a short trip to Riverside, Cal., which was reached at 4:20 P. M. on the same day. Upon arrival a committee of Los Angeles Lodge No. 487, headed by Brother I. R. Rubin, met the party. An automobile tour through the city and beautiful suburbs, dotted with orange groves, was made, including the ride to Mount Rubidoux. Returning to the city, dinner was served at the Mission Inn, one of the most magnificent hotels on the Pacific Coast.

San Diego, Cal.

Leaving Riverside at 7:30 in the evening, the party arrived at San Diego at 11:00 o'clock in the evening of the same day. A few stations out from San Diego a committee of Lasker Lodge of that city, headed by Brother Dr. Hyman Lischner, met the party and escorted it to the Grant Hotel. In the morning a drive by automobile around the Bay of San Diego over a six-mile boulevard course, one of the finest in Southern California, was made. This included a visit to the international headquarters of the Universal Brotherhood and Theosophical Society at Point Loma, where a concert and reception, specially arranged in honor of the delegates, was held. A view of the open air Greek theater and addresses of welcome there delivered by representatives of Madame Tingley and responses by Brothers Adolf Kraus, Simon Wolf and Philip Stein, were some of the features of the morning's tour. From the Theosophical headquarters the drive was continued in automobiles to the extreme end of Point Loma, the southernmost point of the United States, where bay and ocean meet. Fort Rosecrans, the U. S. Government reservation, and the wireless station were visited. A stop-over of 30 minutes was indulged in during which time a lunch was served by the members of Lasker Lodge and their ladies. The drive back took the party to the Hotel Coronado for dinner. In the evening a special meeting of Lasker Lodge was held in the Masonic Temple and the visiting degree team of the Central B'nai B'rith Council of Chicago, composed of Brothers Wm. Wilhartz, Adolph D. Weiner, Edward Sonnenschein, and A. B. Seelenfreund, initiated a class of nine candidates. Addresses were delivered by Brothers Isidore Rosenthal, Simon Wolf and Harry Cutler.

MR. OTTO IRVING WISE,
Chairman San Francisco Committee on Arrangements

The following day, April 26, was reserved for a visit to the Panama-California Exposition at Balboa Park. The same had been officially declared by the exposition authorities as B'nai B'rith Day. The program included general sight-seeing and lunch at the exposition grounds. During the latter formal address of welcome was delivered to the delegates by the president of the exposion and response was made by Brother Abe Lewenthal.

Los Angeles, Cal.

Leaving San Diego the morning of April 27, the party reached Los Angeles at noon the same day. Upon arrival a committee received the party and escorted it to the hotel, where luncheon was served. In the afternoon sight seeing by automobiles through Los Angeles city and neighboring suburbs and pleasure resorts was indulged in. In the evening a theater party at the celebrated Mission Play House at San Gabriel near Los Angeles was arranged. The local committee provided special electric trains for the accommodation of the party and also arranged for its admission. The evening was enjoyably spent. The following day was devoted to side trips from Los Angeles, one to Mount Lowe and the other to the Catalina Islands. Both excursions were very much enjoyed. In the evening a special meeting of Los Angeles Lodge was held at its B'nai B'rith Building, on which occasion a class of over 100 candidates was initiated by a degree team composed of Brothers Edw. Sonnenschein, Adolph D. Weiner, Sylvan E. Hess and A. B. Seelenfreund. At the conclusion of the initiatory work addresses were delivered by Brothers W. W. Bearman, President of Los Angeles Lodge; Simon Wolf, Adolf Kraus, Harry Cutler and others.

The following day was devoted to an automobile tour of Pasadena and vicinity, including a visit to Universal City, where the most extensive motion picture plant in the country is located, and the party was privileged to view the interesting work of producing a motion picture, including pictures taken of the party.

Bakersfield, Cal.

On the evening of April 30, the journey was resumed, arriving at Bakersfield the following morning, May 1, where breakfast was served. Despite the early hour a great number of Bakersfield Lodge and their ladies were present to greet the visitors and present them with flowers and fruit.

Fresno, Cal.

The next stopping point was Fresno, Cal., which was reached about noon the same day. Almost all the members of Fresno Lodge and their ladies met the party upon arrival and escorted them by automobile to the leading hotel where lunch was served. Cases and boxes of raisins, bottles of wines, and fruits of all kinds were showered upon the visitors by the committee of Fresno Lodge.

Stockton, Cal.

Leaving Fresno, the party made a short stop at Stockton, Cal., where representatives of Hope Lodge and their ladies met the party and extended hearty greetings. Here again the committee of the lodge presented cherries and other fruits, as well as flowers to the members of the party.

San Francisco was reached on the evening of May 1 at 7:00 o'clock.

Opening of the Convention.

The Constitution Grand Lodge of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith opened its Tenth Quinquennial Session at the Civic Auditorium, San Francisco, on Sunday morning, May 2, 1915, at 10:00 o'clock.

The convention was called to order by the President of the Order, Adolf Kraus. Prayer was offered by Rabbi J. Nieto. Addresses of welcome were delivered by Hon. James Rolph, Jr., Mayor of San Francisco, on behalf of the city; by Brother Harry K. Wolff, President of District Grand Lodge No. 4, on behalf of the District; and by Hon. Julius Kahn, member of the House of Representatives, on behalf of the State of California. President Kraus responded.

Brothers A. B. Seelenfreund and Leon L. Lewis were appointed to act as Secretary and Assistant Secretary respectively.

A temporary organization was effected by the election of Brother Jos. D. Coons as temporary Chairman and A. B. Seelenfreund as Temporary Secretary.

Report of the Committee on Credentials, showing the presence of 91 delegates, was adopted and the Convention was permanently organized by the election of Brother Abe Lewenthal of Cleveland as Permanent Chairman and Brother A. B. Seelenfreund of Chicago as Permanent Secretary.

Upon reconvening in the afternoon the message of the President of the Order, Brother Adolf Kraus, was read covering the Order's activities during the past five years and reviewing the work accomplished on behalf of charitable and educational problems and other important Jewish questions. Upon conclusion of the reading of the President's message all the delegates rose to their feet and indulged in an enthusiastic demonstration of approval. The message of President Adolf Kraus contains 75 printed pages. Owing to lack of space it is impossible to republish it in full. Extracts of the Message appear in another part of this issue.

After the reading of the Message of the President the various standing committees were appointed and this concluded the first day's session.

Public Meeting, Civic Auditorium.

On Sunday evening a public meeting was held with Brother Lucius L. Solomons presiding. The following was the program of exercises:

Monday's Sessions.

On Monday morning the delegates assembled at the B'nai B'rith Building where the remainder of the sessions were held.

The Convention being called to order, Rabbi David Alexander offered prayer. Telegrams conveying greetings from a great number of lodges were presented, also letters from prominent members of the Order from all parts of the world.

Brother Simon Wolf presented letters from President Wilson, Ex-Presidents Roosevelt and Taft, Secretary of State Bryan, Chairman of The American Red Cross Miss Boardman, the German Ambassador, the Austro-Hungarian Ambassador, and Ex-Secretary of Commerce and Labor Nagel. We publish President Wilson letter in full and extracts from the others:

Letter From President Wilson.

"White House, Washington, D. C., April 7, 1915.

My dear Mr. Wolf:

I read with the greatest interest the letter you were kind enough to leave with me a short time ago bearing the signatures of representatives of the Order of B'nai B'rith and the Hebrew Congregations of the United States. I beg that you will assure those who were kind enough to send me this interesting letter that I follow from time to time with the greatest interest the fine work of the organizations which they represent, work which undoubtedly contributes to the uplift and betterment of the nation, and I have been particularly interested in the work of education and philanthropy and the effort to destroy so far a they can the provincialism of prejudice as between races.

Will you not be kind enough to convey to them my warm appreciation of their letter and my assurance that whenever and in whatever way it may be possible for me to serve the interests which they represent, I shall conceive it a privilege to do so?

Cordially and sincerely yours,
(Sgd) Woodrow Wilson.

Hon. Simon Wolf,
Woodward Building,
Washington, D. C."

Greetings From Mr. Roosevelt.

Permit me to extend my hearty good wishes to the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith and to wish all the success in continuing its work in strengthening the ties between man and man, and endeavoring to contribute to the uplift and betterment of humanity. It has been a great educational and enlightening factor in our American life.

Greetings From Mr. Taft.

I have great respect for the Order, because of the good which it has done, the conservative attitude which it has occupied, the harmonizing effect which it has had upon otherwise discordant elements, and the general world Fraternity which it has promoted.

It is a body of representative American Citizens, that deserve the approval and encouragement of all their fellow citizens.

I sincerely hope that the Convention will be full of usefulness on the one hand, and of enjoyment for the members of the Order on the other.

Greetings From Secretary Bryan.

I profoundly appreciate the large work which this great International Organization has done in the matter of education and social uplift.

Please present to the members in most cordial language my compliments and good wishes, and give expression to the interest which I feel in the work that the Order has done, and in the still larger work before it in propagating peace and good will throughout the world.

Greetings From Ambassador Bernstorff.

I beg to present my sincere congratulations to the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith assembled for its quinquennial anniversary in San Francisco.

I highly appreciate the spirit which the association has shown in doing charitable work here and also in Germany, and express my sincere wishes that this spirit will live with equal success for generations.

Greetings From Ambassador Dumba.

It affords me great pleasure to send greetings to the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith in Convention assembled.

The merits of the Order are well known to the world at large and are greatly appreciated in my country. Austrians and Hungarians are in sympathy with its generous program to obtain equal rights for all members of humanity.

I hope that the Convention will appreciate the civilizing mission in whose interest Austria-Hungary has fought for centuries, and that the attitude the Dual-Monarchy takes in the present war will meet with the full sympathy and moral support of the Convention.

Greetings From Miss Boardman.

May 1, on the part of the American Red Cross, extend warm greetings to the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith at its quinquennial Convention.

It was a pleasure some five years ago to address this representative body of Jewish men here in Washington. Since then we have received continuous support and sympathetic interest and aid from the Jewish people in America.

With most hearty appreciation and gratitude for the aid of the Jewish people in the great humanitarian work of the Red Cross, and asking for their continued assistance and interest, I am,

Sincerely yours.

Greetings From Mr. Nagel.

Permit me to express best wishes for the success of the great charitable and [illegible] work of the Order.

At no time in our history has there been more need for enlightened toleration, or better reason for taking account of the real contributors to our country's welfare.

The morning's session was devoted principally to the introduction of various resolutions and their reference to appropriate committees.

The arrangements committee served luncheon to the delegates at the B'nai B'rith Hall.

Lunch to the Visiting Ladies.

At noon a lunch in honor of the visiting ladies of the delegates was held in the [illegible] Room of the Fairmont Hotel. [illegible] was Chairman of the committee on arrangements.

After the luncheon the visiting ladies were given an automobile ride over the city. The party was taken to the Cliff House, where tea was served.

Afternoon Session.

During the afternoon session communications and resolutions were presented and referred to their respective committees. The special order of business for this session was the address of Brother Jacob Billikopf of Kansas City, who spoke on "Social Service." The address was listened to with much attention and at its conclusion it was greatly applauded. The afternoon session was brought to a close with the presentation of a medal to the Secretary of the Convention, Brother A. B. Seelenfreund. The presentation address was made by Brother Simon Wolf and a brief response was made by the recipient.

Reception and Dance.

On Monday evening a reception and ball in honor of the visiting delegates and their ladies was given in the colonial ball room of the St. Francis Hotel. Over 400 couples participated in the grand march and the dancing that followed. The Reception Committee appointed to greet those in attendance was headed by Mr. Geo. N. Black. Mr. Isidore M. Golden was floor manager, and the Chairman of the Executive Committee on Arrangements was Mr. Otto Irving Wise.

Tuesday's Session.

Upon convening the Convention adjourned until the afternoon, so as to afford the various standing committees an opportunity to consider the subject matters referred to them.

The afternoon session was called to order at 2:00 o'clock. Prayer was offered by Rabbi Magnin of Stockton, Cal. The convention ordered greetings to be sent to Brothers Henry Morgenthau, U. S. Ambassador to Turkey; Jacob H. Schiff, New York; Dr. Moses Gaster, London; Mrs. Julius Bien, New York; Mrs. Leo N. Levi, New York; Dr. Edward N. Calisch, Richmond, Va.; Martin A. Marks, Cleveland, and Sol Marx, New Orleans.

Brother Henry Cohen, on behalf of the Committee on Social Service, submitted the following report, which was unanimously adopted:

Report of Committee on Social Service.

Paragraph 2 of recommendation 12 of the President's Message aptly states, "our efforts should be directed towards preventing others from becoming helpless." Work of this nature has been carried on by a large number of our lodges and since this recommendation of our President has been amplified and stressed by the excellent paper of Brother Jacob Billikopf, Chairman of the Social Service Commission of District No. 2, therefore your Committee on Social Service begs to report as follows:

We heartily concur in the ideas underlying the recommendation of the President's message as refers to Social Service, and we recommend the following:

1. A Social Service Bureau shall be established under the supervision of the Executive Committee.

2. The scope of the work to be undertaken by the Social Service Bureau shall be determined by the Executive Committee of the Constitution Grand Lodge and may include among other duties encouragement of the Big Brother and Big Sister movement; arranging for adequate ministration to Jews confined in penal and corrective institutions; visiting such eleemosynary institutions as homes for the blind, deaf and dumb, and insane; and the compilation of such statistical data as will enable us to devise ways and means for fully realizing Jewish social ideals; keeping in touch with juvenile courts; establishing bureaus for the dissemination of information among the masses concerning prevalent dangers; procuring employment, giving advice and counsel to those released from penal and corrective institutions; and in co-operation with existing agencies assist in the distribution of immigrants and their Americanization.

3. To carry out the intention of this resolution the Executive Committee is hereby authorized to employ an expert and to incur such expenditures as it may deem proper.

Brother Charles Hartman, Chairman of the Committee on Anti-Defamation League, submitted its report, which was adopted. The report in part is as follows:

Report of Committee on Anti-Defamation League

Your Committee on Anti-Defamation League begs leave to report that the work of this League has been given such wide publicity that it scarcely needed the report of the President of the League to inform us of its work. We have, however, carefully considered this admirable report as well as those portions of the President's message dealing with the work of the League, and we recommend that this Convention approve of the organization and the splendid work already done by the League and which it is doing, and we recommend that the same be continued.

We especially approve the draft of "Principles" adopted by the League as constituting a fair, non-partisan platform upon which all persons, Jew and non-Jew alike, may stand.

We regard the work already done by the League as one of the most beneficial accomplishments that have been furthered by the Order, and for that reason strongly recommend to the Finance Committee that adequate appropriation of necessary funds be made with which to carry on the work of the League.

We approve the special recommendations of the President of the League, reading as follows:

(1) That the campaign against every form of scurrilous attack and defamation of the Jew be energetically continued.

(2) That every publication which tends to defame the Jew be properly and manfully answered by a publication setting forth the truth in such manner as to reach the same reading public.

(3) That every cause of unjust discrimination against the Jew be carefully investigated and combatted by honorable means.

(4) That the campaign to eradicate from the curriculum of our public schools all literature which tends to poison the minds of children be continued.

(5) That the survey of the economic and sociological condition of the Jews of this country be systematically carried out along the lines stated.

(6) That a conservative educational plan be undertaken, so that the general public may know the facts concerning the Jew. Such a campaign should include, among others, the following media:

(a) By furnishing for publication articles on the status of the Jew in its various phases.

(b) By encouraging the circulation through public and university libraries of books which truthfully set for the history, religion, traditions, ethics, culture and philosophy of the Jew.

Report of Ritual Committee was also presented and adopted.

The Convention took a recess until 8:00 o'clock in the evening.

Evening Session

The evening session was devoted wholly to the consideration of the report of the Committee on Constitution. A number of radical changes in the organic law of the Order were made, principally among them the enactment of a law defining qualifications for membership in the Order, providing that every member of the Order must be of the Jewish faith; the creation of an emergency trust fund, providing for the annual collection of a fixed amount from all members of the Order towards a fund to be used in cases of calamity; declaring the Menorah to be the official emblem of the Order; authorizing the election of two or more vice-presidents in Grand Lodges outside of America.

The session lasted until 2:00 o'clock in the morning, when it adjourned until 8:00 p. m. the following day.

B'nai B'rith Day at the Exposition

Wednesday, May 5, was B'nai B'rith Day at the Panama-Pacific International Exposition. All the delegates and their ladies with local members were the guests of the Exposition at the formal exercises in the California Building. Rabbi Martin A. Meyer was chairman of the day. The ceremonies began with a prayer by Rabbi Jos. S. Kornfeld of Columbus, Ohio. The speakers were Abr. Lewenthal, Chairman of the Convention; Simon Wolf, Edw. Sonnenschein, and Arthur Arlett representing Governor Johnson, and Frank L. Brown representing the Exposition authorities. Rabbi Meyer spoke on "Progress and Religious Liberty."

Bronze Medal Presented

Mr. Frank L. Brown, a Director of the Exposition, presented to A. Lowenthal president of the convention, a bronze medal, in token of the Exposition's appreciation of the co-operation of the B'nai B'rith.

Mr. Simon Wolf, whom Rabbi Meyer introduced as "the unofficial ambassador of the Jews at Washington," spoke on "The Land of Opportunity."

Mr. Arthur Arlett delivered for Governor Johnson a special message of affection for the Jewish people, citing the names of many of the governor's intimate friends as evidence of the governor's attitude.

"The Misunderstood People" was the subject of Edward Sonnenschein of Chicago. He spoke of the domination of the world of Jewish ethical and religious culture, and the survival of the ancient Jewish conception of an invisible God, against the Grecian deities and defended the Jew, specificially, against various prejudiced charges, which he declared are made even in America today.

After the exercises, the delegates were guests at a luncheon at the Old Faithful Inn, at which United States Senator James D. Phelan spoke on "California."

Wednesday Evening Session

The entire session was devoted to a further consideration of the report of the Committee on Constitution.

The proposition to authorize the appointment of a member-at-large on the Executive Committee was, after a lengthy debate, adopted. An executive session was held before adjourning. At a late hour the convention adjourned until 9:30 a. m. Thursday.

Thursday Morning Session

An important feature of the morning session was the consideration and adoption of the following report of the Committee on Immigration, submitted by its Chairman, Brother Harry Cutler.

Report of the Committee on Immigration

The Committee on Immigration having held several hearings and having carefully considered the resolutions referred to it by this convention, respectfully submits the following:

As American citizens, we re-affirm our belief in the true American policy, the exercise of which has contributed to the prosperity of the American Nation—a policy which, in harmony with the traditions of our country, has extended a hospitable welcome to those immigrating from other countries, whether as voluntary immigrants or as the involuntary refugees forced to leave their native land by persecution of a religious or political nature.

On the I. O. B. B. devolves the sacred duty of insisting upon the maintenance of this principle, particularly as it affects our brethren who come to these shores, whether from choice or as a result of political persecution.

We recognize in the problem of Immigration one of the great problems before the nation—a question whose solution requires not only clearness of vision but also high-mindedness and bigheartedness. There is no doubt that the exclusion of the physically, morally and mentally unifit, is imperative for the safeguarding of our country's interests; to that end, the existing Immigration laws are sufficient and have the unqualified approval of our organization. On the other hand, it is equally obvious that the welfare of our country demands the admission of all those who can add by brain and brawn to the idealism and the national prosperity of our country.

Our gates should be kept open to those who seek these blessed shores as the door of hope and opportunity for the upbuilding of themselves and at the same time contributing their share to the Commonwealth.

We maintain that the problem of immigration is essentially one of distribution, and we earnestly recommend that as patriotic citizens we should devote our best efforts to the study of the best means of diverting our immigrant population from the larger cities, especially the ports of entry, to the sparsely populated sections of our country—more particularly to the vast tracts of uncultivated land, which if put into cultivation would support millions who, besides maintaining themselves, would change many a desert into a garden spot.

Your committee approves Resolution No. 31 introduced by District No. 7 and recommends that the Constitution Grand Lodge should appoint a commission of seven, one from each of the American Districts, whose functions shall be the careful study of the entire subject of Immigration and distribution.

The opening of the Panama Canal, the economic questions involved through industrial congestion in large centers of our population, the remedial measures to be accomplished by the "back to the soil" movement, the advantages of reclamation of abandoned farms in New England, together with the tremendous opportunities which the vast unpopulated sections of the middle and western parts of our country present; the enactment of such laws as may tend to open up the immense land-holdings now out of use and unproductive, the dissemination of true information regarding our Immigrant laws and industrial conditions, often misrepresented at the ports of embarkation but which can be corrected through the machinery of our European districts, and the entire subject affecting the stream of immigration to our shores —to deal with these matters and to formulate a preparedness on the part of our brotherhood both here and abroad that shall put into practical form the mission of our fraternity with respect to this very serious problem, requires a special commission regardless as to whether the conclusion of hostilities abroad will increase or diminish immigration. This commission shall collate data on these subjects and formulate such Federal or State laws as the investigation, observation and conditions may warrant, and submit all such recommendations to the Executive Committee for approval before the same are introduced in any legislative body either Federal or State, and before any publicity whatever is given to the same.

Your committee has given careful study to Resolution No. 21, which recommends the establishment of an Immigrant Bank in this country such as is now being operated under the auspices of the Society for the Regulation of Jewish Immigrants at Petrograd, and similar to the banks which are operated in this country for the benefit of the Austro-Hungarian subjects, the Transatlantic Trust Co., the Immigration Industrial Savings Bank, operated by the Irish Immigrant Society of New York, and similar institutions.

Your committee deems its unwise for the I. O. B. B. as an organization to subscribe any of its funds to the formation of a corporation of this character, however meritorious it may be, but is in hearty sympathy with the spirit of the proposition.

The committee is pleased to report that upon the suggestion of Brothers H. K. Wolf, President of District No. 4, and H. Gutstadt, of this committee, who ably set forth the urgent need of a branch of this Society in the City of San Francisco, Brother I. Irving Lipsitch, the manager of this Society, a member of the General Committee of District No. 1, has assured your committee that this branch will be established in the near future under the auspices and at the expense of the Hebrew Sheltering and Immigrant Aid Society of America.

In considering the recommendation herewith submitted in this report, your committee has earnestly interpreted the spirit of that portion of the President's message which deals with the subject of immigration and which was referred to it. Your committee heartily approves the recommendations, the thought and broadness of vision annunciated in the message of President Kraus on this subject. In presenting these suggestions, we were inspired by the warm sympathies expressed by our President with those of our faith who come here to seek a haven of refuge and equal opportunity to carve their own careers and give of their best talent to the prosperity of this nation of religious liberty and political equality.

As a supplement to this formal report, your committee deems it an honor and pleasure in calling to the attention of this Convention the unselfish labor, the earnestness and zeal with which the grand warrior for civic rights, our representative in Washington, the Honorable Simon Wolf, has at all times championed the cause of our co-religionists whenever called upon by any agency in or out of the Order, by any organization or individual, desiring his counsel. His activity in presenting the humanitarian aspects of our unfortunate Jewish immigrants who seek refuge within our borders and his untiring labor has brought cheer, encouragement and happiness in the fullest measure to innumerable families whose door of hope would otherwise have been closed, and we heartily voice the sentiment that God may spare Brother Wolf so that at the next meeting in 1920 he will be found in our midst still working for the cause of the defenseless and holding aloft the banner of Light, of Justice and of Truth.

The report of the Committee on Charitable Institutions, providing for a total appropriation of $80,000 for benevolent, charitable and educational purposes, was adopted.

The report of the Committee on Intellectual Advancement as well as the report of the Committee on President's Message, were presented and unanimously adopted.

Before adjourning it was ordered that the consideration of the report of the Committee on State of the Order be made a special order of business for the afternoon session at 3:00 o'clock.

Afternoon Session

The special feature of this session was the consideration of the report of the Committee on State of the Order, presented by the Chairman, Brother Jacob Furth. The report was unanimously adopted; it is as follows:

Report of the Committee on State of the Order

Your Committee on the State of the Order begs leave to report as follows:

The splendid attendance at this meeting is proof of the wisdom in selecting San Francisco as our Convention City. The mere fact that so many of our brethren were willing to travel the extent of our vast country to attend a meeting called to advance the best interests of our beloved Order; that they were willing to give up the time and undergo the inconvenience and hardship of so long a journey to devote themselves to the advancement of an organization idealistic in character, altruistic in purpose and unselfish in scope, gives reasonable ground for the belief that our deliberations will redound not only to the best interests of the Order, but also to the glory of our people and to the service of humanity.

We find that the Order has made a very substantial growth in membership during the past five years. A large number of Lodges were instituted not only in the United States and in Canada, but in European and Asiatic countries as well. The wisdom of establishing a District Grand Lodge in the Orient has already been demonstrated. In view of the many changes which will unquestionably develop in the territorial divisions of the Old World when the present war will have ended, District Grand Lodge No. 11 will likely have an importance which can as yet be but imperfectly prognosticated.

We fully agree with the President in the high estimate which he places upon the activities and labors of our late Brother Sigmund Bergel. The Order owes a debt of gratitude to him which has been properly voiced by the President of the Order. Let us hope that his example of loyalty and devotion may be followed by others so that we may never want for leadership and for men typifying the idealism for which we stand.

The terrible conflict now raging and so seriously affecting the welfare of many of our co-religionists and threatening the very existence of others, has imposed duties and obligations upon us the appreciation of which has served to demonstrate the truth of the assertion that the most practical among men is the idealist. We express our great admiration of the spirit shown by our European brethren when attending to the wants of the needy regardless of affiliation with the Order, and to the utter disregard of their own interests. Never in the history of the Order has it stood higher in the estimation of the world than it does at the present time.

We note with much pleasure the statement made by the President, "that the energies of the Order are and for some time have been devoted more or less directly toward securing the freedom and equality of rights and opportunities for Jews in every land." We are confident that when at the conclusion of the terrible conflict now raging, the status and rights of the various nations involved will be considered and defended, the rights of the Jew will be adequately considered and properly safeguarded. We feel equally confident that the Executive Committee of the Order will, at the proper time, make or cause to be made through proper channels such representations as shall be deemed most effective for the conservation of the rights of our co-religionists throughout the world.

State of the Order.

The reference made by the President to the work done in and by the various Districts is not only intensely interesting but very instructive. We have no desire to make invidious distinctions. We know that conditions vary and that methods applicable in one District may not be applicable to the conditions in other Districts, but we do believe that fundamentals apply to all cases. Industry, enthusiasm and perseverance, coupled with intelligent and systematic work, always bring good results.

We recommend the adoption of approved measures such as bring the best results in other activities. We recommend getting away from sporadic efforts and resorting to constant and systematic work. . . .

We are pleased to know that all local emergencies were promptly met and satsifactorily handled. It is a pleasure to know that our brethren were ever ready to care for the afflicted and go to their assistance when through storm and flood their lives and fortunes were menaced.

Our brethren were no less ready to give a helping hand to our co-religionists living in the war zones of Europe, where untold misery and suffering were and still are being experienced. The excellent organization of our Order made it possible for us not only to promptly solicit and obtain large sums of money, but it enabled us to distribute the same to the best possible advantage.

This was also demonstrated when money was needed to alleviate the suffering caused by the fire in Constantinople and by the ravages of the war in the Balkan Peninsula. Ours was the first money to arrive and was therefore the most appreciated. . . .

We heartily concur in the views of President Kraus that a fund be placed at the disposal of the Executive Committee for promptly alleviating suffering and misfortune of our co-religionists in times of emergency or great stress, and recommend the establishment of an Emergency Trust Fund, the annual contribution to which to be fixed by this Convention.

Your committee lays stress on the fact that the state of the Order is at all times thoroughly dependent on the work of the officers of the subordinate lodges. We urge that great care should be exercised in the selection of lodge officials and in the selection of delegates to the District and Constitution Grand Lodges.

It is an honor to hold office in any B'nai B'rith lodge, and those who are so honored must be willing and must have the ability to serve in a manner calculated to uphold the dignity of the Order. Every effort should be made to make the Order a live and vital force for moral uplift. . . .

It is a source of great satisfaction to know that the work of the Order is very largely in the hands of our young people. The ardor and enthusiasm of youth, coupled with the intelligence that comes from a systematic education, has brought results such as always come when modern ideas and progressive methods go hand in hand with industry, loyalty and energy.

The Order continues to be on terms of intimacy with the Congregation, the Synagogue and the Temple. Democracy continues to be the watchword and the keynote of the Order. Our sympathies go out as much as ever before to the immigrant forced to flee from his native land and eager to establish for himself and for his children a home and a refuge.

We trust our lodge and our brethren will in the future, as they have done in the past, co-operate with the established Jewish activities that make for the betterment, for the advancement and for the success of the immigrant. The problem of a proper distribution of immigrants is before us, and as immigration will again reach and perhaps surpass former dimensions, the Order will gladly assist in the work of decentralization.

Eleemosynary Institutions.

The addition of institutions and benefactions fostered and supported, either in whole or in part, by the Order, must tend to a still better recognition on the part of the community, of the value of our services.

In this connection, we are pleased to note that the Leo N. Levi Memorial Hospital at Hot Springs is now in full operation. We commend this institution to the general support of our Lodges and our members.

The B'nai B'rith News

We heartily concur in the flattering estimate made by the President of the splendid work done by the official organ of the Order, the B'nai B'rith News. We heartily commend its splendid achievements. We regard it as a most vital and effective factor in propaganda work and as an able exponent of the ideals and work of the Order. The dignified tone of the publication, its high literary merit and the lofty standard which it has adopted, reflect great credit upon the Order. We compliment the editors upon the excellence of this work. . . .

We sincerely trust that ample arrangements will be made for ways and means to continue this enterprise even on a larger scale.

Educational League

We are pleased to know that the efforts of the Educational League in the interest of the higher education of talented orphans, are meeting with great success.

We trust that the Order will continue to interest itself in the splendid work of the Educational League and that ways and means will be provided to enable the league to extend its usefulness to the largest possible number of applicants.

Social Service

The systematic introduction of social service and general welfare work under the skillful and scientific management of an expert, will do much to help us gain and retain the good will, respect and co-operation of our co-religionists. Thus far we have busied ourselves with helping dependents. We are about to introduce a new department of welfare work by looking up, helping and comforting the defectives and delinquents among us. To rehabilitate those who have fallen by the wayside; to give comfort and consolation to those that are groveling in the depths of despair; to open a vista of hope to those who otherwise would sink deeper and deeper in the quagmire of moral depravity, must appeal to all who are abreast of the times and cognizant of the great effort that is being made by the social welfare workers of the land.

Conclusion

We are convinced that at no time in the history of the Order have there been accorded to our membership opportunities of service such as present themselves at this time. At no stage of the Order's existence has it been confronted, either in this country or abroad, with problems more weighty or responsibilities more serious. We are persuaded that a new day is before us and that in all truth a new era has already dawned for our Fraternity.

In the last analysis, the best propaganda for the Order inheres in the activities of each individual Lodge,—"By their work ye shall know them." It is not sufficient that Lodges should rest content in pointing to the general work of the Order, however worthy the same may be. Rather it is incumbent upon them to engage, in so far as they possibly can, in some definite constructive local work. In the activities of the Anti-defamation League and in the endeavors in behalf of the immigrant and of the Social Service work will be found ample opportunities for work.

We recommend to the incoming Executive Committee the preparation from time to time of literature for distribution among Lodges and among non-members, to contain authoritative expositions of the purposes, policies and the work of the Order. We further suggest that, upon their return to their respective cities after this Convention adjourns, as well as following upon the Convention of the various District Grand Lodges, delegates thereto, in so far as may be feasible, shall in the Lodge rooms, from the Jewish Pulpit and otherwise, make known the thoughts and actions of such Conventions.

Great problems and great opportunities will present themselves to us in the near future. In order that the best results may be obtained, the hearty co-operation and full appreciation of the American Jewry is needed. The efforts we have made in the past and the success thus far achieved entitle us to the hope that we will receive in the future, as we have received in the past, the hearty co-operation and encouragement of our co-religionists throughout the land.

With no serious problem of our own, we will be in position to devote ourselves to those of our co-religionists that have become impoverished by the war, for they have a right to look to us for help, for aid and for assistance.

May God grant us the power, as we have the will, to dedicate our lives to this great service of humanity. May the Order continue to spread light, comfort and hope among those that are bowed down and afflicted, and may we continue to glorify God by aiding our fellow man.

Report of the Committee on Propaganda was presented and adopted.

Brother Lucius L. Solomons submitted the report of the Committee on Necrology, which we adopted.

At the conclusion of the reading of the report the Convention rose and Dr. S. Wolfenstein recited the "Kaddish."

The final report of the Committee on Finance was then presented and was adopted, and this was followed by the report of the Committee on Resolutions, which was unanimously adopted.

The selection of the place for holding the next convention of the Order was then taken up for consideration. Invitations for the next convention were received from Chicago, Dayton, Atlantic City, New York City, Toledo and Cleveland. The convention unanimously selected Cleveland as the meeting place in 1920.

Election of Officers

The election of officers was declared the final order of business. Brother Sig Livingston, in placing in nomination Brother Adolf Kraus to succeed himself as President of the Order, addressed the Convention as follows:

President Kraus Nominated

"It is a great honor to be the President of this Order. When we consider that this is the only organization of the Jewish people, international in its scope and large enough to include all the various sects of Israel, that it is the one organization which feels the heart-throbs of the orphan children among the nations, that it acts as the watch of the night in the camp of Israel, that it represents the dream and the hope of millions yet shackled by the tyranny of religious persecution, that it enshrines the beauty of the past and the promise of the future, to be the leader of such an organization is the greatest honor that Jewry can bestow upon a Jew.

"The time is now for us to name a leader of strength, of wisdom, of capacity, and of power. A man who will measure up to the standard set by Julius Bien, Leo N. Levi, Simon Wolf and our present encumbent. He must be a man, described by the prophet, whose loins are girded with righteousness and whose sides are armed with truth.

"The problems of the Jewry of today are as great as they were in the past, and we stand now face to face with new conditions, which will test the strength of those that assume the duties of leadership. We are yet upon Mount Mizpah, struggling in the cause of Israel. Ours is the duty to lighten the burdens of the oppressed, to establish justice, to break down prejudice, to cast off the shackles of persecution, and to speed the day when all nations and all peoples will recognize the full rights of all human kind.

"The president of an institution like ours, dedicated to these high ends, must not only possess the qualites of leadership, but must be willing to bring sacrifices. Since our last convention mighty work has been accomplished under the splendid leadership of our president. The brotherhood in foreign lands has been strongly united. The membership has had a healthy growth. Delicate questions of diplomacy have been solved with statesmanlike skill. The struggle to keep untarnished the good name of the American Jew has been efficient. The needs of those distressed by misfortune have received the tender care that they required. The oriflame of Israel has been held high and is now returned to us undefiled and with glory and with honor.

"We are now at the crucial time to select the man as leader to carry on this splendid work. When Pharoah, in the great crisis of his career, had to select a leader for his people in the great struggle before them, he said to his counselors,

"'Can we find such a one as this is,

"'A man in whom the spirit of God is?'

and Pharoah said unto Joseph,

"'For as much as God hath shown thee all this,

"'There is none so discreet and wise as thou art.'

"So we, in this sacred moment, inquire, 'Can we find such a one as this is, a man inu whom the spirit of God is?' And our eyes are turned to one who has interpreted the dreams of the dreamers of the world, and we answer, 'For as much as God has shown thee all this, there is none so discreet and wise as thou art,'

"For the Presidency of the Order, I nominate that true son of Israel, Adolf Kraus."

Brother Kraus was re-elected by acclamation.

The following other officers were elected: First Vice President, Lucius L. Solomons, San Francisco; Second Vice-President, Archibald A. Marx, New Orleans; Members of the Executive Committee—District No. 1, Chas. Hartman, New York; District No. 2, Jacob Furth, St. Louis; District No. 3, Jacob Singer, Philadelphia; District No. 5, Dr. E. N. Calisch, Richmond; District No. 6, Philip Stein, Chicago; Court of Appeals of the Order—Victor Abraham, Cincinnati, Chief Justice; District No. 1, Chas. M. Stern, Albany; District No. 2, Leon Block, Kansas City; District No. 3, Isidore Rosenthal, Lancaster; District No. 4, Edward I. Wolfe, San Francisco; District No. 5, Leonard Haas, Atlanta; District No. 6, Sig Livingston, Bloomington; District No. 7, Henry Hanaw, Mobile, Ala.

Remarks were then made by the President of the Order, Brothers Simon Wolf, Sol Sulzberger, Otto Irving Wise, Lucius L. Solomons, and Archibald A. Marx, whereupon the Convention was closed with prayer by Rabbi Henry Cohen, and adjourned sine die.

Class Initiation

On Thursday evening, May 6, 1915, a class initiation of 270 candidates pertaining to the various San Francisco lodges by a specially drilled degree team was one of the special entertainment features presented to the delegates. The affair took place in Golden Gate Commandery Hall. The degree team was gowned. At the conclusion of the initiatory work addresses were made by Brothers Harry Cutler on the subject, "My Brother," [illegible] M. Friedlander on "Double Aspect of the History of the Order" and by [illegible] Kraus on "The Order."

After the adjournment of the Convention the majority of the delegates and their ladies remained for a few days' sight-seeing.

Excursion to Mt. Tamalpais and Muir Woods

On Friday morning, May 7, the visitors were entertained with an excursion to Mt. Tamalpais and the Muir Woods. The trip included a steamer ride across the Bay and railroad trip to the top of the mountain. Arriving there, the entire party was entertained at luncheon by the committee of the San Francisco lodges, Brother Milton Meyer presiding. Brother Victor Abraham delivered an address on "American Israel," short talks were made by Brothers Simon Wolf and Isidor M. Golden, and by Mrs. M. A. Weinberg.

Services at the Temples

On Saturday morning, May 8, the various visiting rabbis attending the convention occupied local pulpits.

Meeting of Unity Lodge, San Francisco

On Monday evening, May 10, the Secretary of the Executive Committee, Brother A. B. Seelenfreund, paid a visit to Unity Lodge No. 273 of San Francisco, at the B'nai B'rith Building. In spite of the inclement weather a goodly attendance was present. An interesting report of the proceedings of the convention was submitted by Brother Otto Irving Wise. This was followed by an address by the visitor on the work of the Order and its aim and objects.

Return Journey

As originally planned, some of the leading members of the Order, including the President of the Order, Brothers Simon Wolf, Harry Cutler, and others, were scheduled to visit the lodges of Portland, Seattle and other cities. Unfortunately, owing to important causes the aforementioned brothers were prevented from carrying out their original intentions.

Owing to severe rains and washouts on the railroad lines the original trip by railroad to Portland had to be abandoned. The party, composed of about forty persons, made the trip by steamship from San Francisco to Favel, Ore., on May 13, and thence by rail to Portland. The water trip was extremely pleasant to those who did not pay tribute to Neptune.

Portland, Ore.

The party arrived at Portland on the evening of May 14, was met by a committee of the Portland lodges headed by Brothers David N. Mosessohn and Jonah B. Wise, and were escorted by automobiles to the hotel.

In the evening the entire party attended services at the Temple and the address was delivered by Brother A. B. Seelenfreund on the subject, "The Greater Work of the Order." At the close of the services an informal reception was held.

Luncheon to Visitors.

On Saturday noon a luncheon was given at the Imperial Hotel by the local B'nai B'rith lodges and was largely attended. Brief addresses commenting on the work of the Order were made by various visitors and by prominent local members of the Order. Brother David N. Mosessohn presided. Of the visiting delegates who addressed the gathering there were Messrs. A. Lewenthal, Sol S. Kiser, E. R. Bernstein, B. J. Samuels, Henry Lasker, B. Margolius, and M. L. Stern. Among the local speakers were Dr. N. Mosessohn, Dr. J Bloch, Dr. A. Tilzer, I. Swett, C. Robinson and O. Kramer.

Following the luncheon the visitors were taken for an automobile trip about the city.

Dedication of B'nai B'rith Building

In the evening a formal dedication of the B'nai B'rith Building was held. Addresses by several of the visiting delegates and by a number of local speakers followed the introduction and welcoming remarks of the chairman of the evening, Mr. D. Solis Cohen. Brothers Chas. L. Aarons and Herman Asher, in addressing the audience, numbering several hundred people, emphasized the need of an institution like the B'nai B'rith Building, forming a center of Jewish activities for the city.

Rabbi Jonah B. Wise, as chairman of the Building Committee, formally turned over the building to the B'nai B'rith Building Association, which was received by Mr. Isaac Swett, the President of the Association. In his remarks, Dr. Wise told of some of the plans and ideals which inspired the builders. The concluding address was made by Mr. David N. Mosessohn, Second Vice President of District Grand Lodge No. 4, who expressed the hope that the new building would make for a greater unity on the part of Portland Jewry. After the formal exercises were concluded, dancing was indulged in in one of the adjoining halls.

On Sunday afternoon the committee took the guests for a drive over the highways surrounding the city, returning to the hotel towards evening.

Banquet

On Sunday evening the local committee in charge of receiving and entertaining the visitors tendered a banquet at the Hotel Benson. More than 100 people were in attendance. Mr. David N. Mosessohn acted as toastmaster and toasts were responded to by Messrs. Chas. L. Aarons, Sol Sulzberger, Herman Asher, Martin Emerich, Julius Juch, Ernest R. Bernstein, Isaac Swett, Rabbi Jonah B. Wise, and A. B. Seelenfreund. The subjects assigned to the various speakers dealt with the different phases of the Order's activities.

The toastmaster concluded the program with a happy address emphasizing the inspiration received by the local B'nai B'rith through the presence of the visitors.

A committee consisting of Brothers A. G. Hartman and L. L. Hartman of Victoria, B. C., attended all functions, representing the lodges of British Columbia. The lodges at Seattle were also represented by the District Deputy, Brother David J. Lipman, who met the party upon its arrival at Portland and extended an invitation to the delegates to spend a few days in Seattle.

On Monday morning, May 17, the party was escorted by the local committee to the station en route to Seattle.

Seattle, Wash.

Seattle, Wash., was reached on Monday afternoon, May 18. The party was greeted at the depot by committees of the local lodges and of the Ladies' Auxiliary. Following an automobile tour around the city, the guests were taken to the Hotel Herald for dinner.

Public Meeting.

One of the largest gatherings of Jewish people in this city was present to greet the visitors at the Odd Fellows Hall in the evening. Every seat available on the main floor and balcony was taken. Rabbi Samuel Koch, presiding, welcomed the visiting delegates and their friends. He introduced the first speaker of the evening, Brother Chas. L. Aarons, of Milwaukee, President of District Grand Lodge No. 6, who said in part as follows:

"The I. O. B. B. is today confronted with problems which are, both in theory and practice, attempted by numerous lodges and associations throughout the United States. Our charitable work occupies a prominent place in the curriculum; we strive to alleviate the sufferings of oppressed humanity throughout Europe; we attempt to handle the problem of immigration in this country applicable especially to the Jew. Our work is not the mere organization of lodges and their little branches. It is not the mere construction's of buildings, their maintenance and their social upkeep. Rather do we attempt to build throughout this world—so torn today with conflict—that tiny, little, elementary principle of brotherly love. We are building a pyramid of love. We are for peace and understanding, and that we may accomplish our aim we must have the appreciation and the recognition of not alone the Jews of the world, but the Christians as well."

Brother Henry Lasker, who was the next speaker, dwelt upon the important part played by the Jewish people in the development of the West, and in conclusion emphasized the duty of the B'nai B'rith lodges to co-operate in the work of assisting the immigrants. The closing address was made by Brother E. R. Bernstein, First Vice-President of District Grand Lodge No. 7, who spoke on the subject, "The Past, Present and Future of the Jew." Between addresses musical selections were offered.

On Tuesday afternoon the guests enjoyed an automobile tour over the Seattle boulevards and a trip to the Puget Sound navy yard.

Services at the Temple.

In the evening the entire party attended services at Temple De Hirsch on the occasion of the Shabuoth festival. Rabbi Koch read the services and the sermon was delivered by Brother A. B. Seelenfreund on the theme, "And I will Betroth Thee Unto me Forever." At the conclusion of the services an informal reception was held to afford the public an opportunity to meet the visitors.

Tacoma, Wash.

At the urgent request of a special committee representing Tacoma Lodge No. 741, the entire party resolved to visit the lodge and reached that city on Tuesday afternoon, May 18, by special interurban train from Seattle. After being greeted by the officers and members of Tacoma Lodge, the party was escorted to the Tacoma Hotel, where the lodge tendered a luncheon to the visitors. Brother Meyer Jacob acted as toastmaster and Past President Brother H. A. Kaufman welcomed the party. Short remarks were made by Brothers Chas. L. Aarons, E. R. Bernstein, B. J. Samuels and A. B. Seelenfreund.

After lunch, automobiles were pressed into service and the visitors were taken along the boulevards to Pt. Defiance Park, the Stadium, and principal residence portions, returning to the depot on their way back to Seattle.

Salt Lake City, Utah.

From Seattle the party proceeded to Salt Lake City, arriving there on May 21, where they were met by a committee of B. F. Peixotto Lodge and escorted to the Newhouse Hotel.

The delegates and ladies and their friends were entertained by B. F. Peixotto Lodge No. 421 of Salt Lake City with a reception and dance at the B'nai B'rith Club Building. Several hundred persons were present. Mr. E. C. Kahn, president of the lodge, extended greetings of welcome to the guests. Responses were made by Brothers Chas. L. Aarons, Harry Cutler, and Wm. Wilhartz. After the formal addresses, dancing was indulged in, during which refreshments were served.

The following morning the party was entertained with a sight-seeing trip about the city and were brought to the Mormon Temple grounds and were specially received by some church dignitaries and escorted to the main auditorium of the Tabernacle, where a special organ recital in honor of the visitors was held. Leaving the Tabernacle, the party assembled at the Newhouse Hotel, where lunch was served by the members of B. F. Peixotto Lodge, and at its conclusion the visitors were taken by automobile to the train.

Denver, Colo.

Upon leaving Salt Lake City, the party proceeded to Denver, Colo., arriving there Saturday morning, May 22. At the depot a committee of Denver Lodge received the visitors and escorted them by automobiles to the Savoy Hotel. In the afternoon an automobile trip through the parks and residence sections of the city was had. In the evening the ladies were entertained with a theater party and the delegates attended a smoker arranged by Denver Lodge No. 171 at the Hotel Albany. Addresses for the good and welfare of the Order were made by many of the visiting delegates and at the conclusion the delegates were met by their ladies at the hotel and an elaborate luncheon was served.

Sunday morning, the entire delegation and friends attended divine services at the Temple to witness Confirmation Exercises conducted by Rabbi Wm. S. Friedman, which were most impressive.

Colorado Springs and Manitou.

In the afternoon the party wended its way to Colorado Springs and Manitou, arriving there towards evening, and was met at the station by a committee of Colorado Springs Lodge and escorted to the Cliff House at Manitou.

Monday and Tuesday were devoted to sight-seeing and excursions, viewing the Seven Falls, the Cave of the Winds, Cripple Creek, Pike's Peak, and other points of interest.

On Tuesday evening the members of Colorado Springs Lodge tendered a reception to the visitors at the Cliff House in Manitou. Short talks were made by Brothers Harry Cutler, E. R. Bernstein, Chas. L. Aarons, and N. Leipheimer. The evening was brought to a close with dancing.

From Colorado Springs the party proceeded direct to Chicago.

Appreciation

The delegates, their ladies and friends feel under many obligations to the various lodges for their hospitality and entertainment. The members of the Executive Committee expressed the hope that the presence of the delegates in the communities where they stopped strengthened Jewish solidarity and infused new enthusiasm in B'nai B'rith ranks.

All of the visitors feel very much indebted to the San Francisco arrangements committee for the painstaking attention, the uniform courtesies extended to each and every one of them, and for the bountiful hospitality and entertainments. The San Francisco brethren will be gratefully remembered by all the visitors, but the one brother who, more than any other, by his courtesy and attention won the admiration of every one present was Brother Otto Irving Wise, chairman of the committee on arrangements and delegate to the convention.

On the trip the travelers expressed appreciation of the service furnished by the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway, and the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway, and the Fred Harvey Dining Stations, particularly of the minute care with which all details of an over 8,000-mile journey were looked after by the officials.
